THE public is now furnished with specifications and the definit charges against the Andover professors. The charges hav been amended, signed, and placed in the hands of the board of visitors and the offending heretics. They are leveled at Professor Smyth, but include the other professors. The gentlemen whose religious feelings hav been shocked point out that Mr. Smyth holds, first, that the Bible is not the "only perfect rule of faith and practice;" second, that Christ in his days of humiliation was finite, being limited in all his attributes, capacities, and attainments; in other words was not "God in man;" third, that no man has the power or capacity to repent without the knowledge of God in Christ; fourth, that mankind, save as they hav received knowledge of "historic Christ," are not sinners, or if they are, are not of such sinfulness as to be in danger of being lost; fifth, that no man can be lost without having knowledge of Christ; sixth, that the atonement of Christ consists essentially in his becoming identified with the human race through his incarnation; seventh, that the trinity is modal or monarchian, and not a trinity of persons; eighth, that the work of the Holy Spirit is chiefly confined to the sphere of historic Christianity; ninth, that the salvation of men is not wholly by grace; tenth, that faith ought to be scientific and rational, rather than scriptural; that there is probation after life for all men who do not decisivly reject Christ, and that this should be emphasized and made even central in systematic theology. He also holds that there is a new theology better than the old, which is bitterly opposed to the creed, and he has in repeated instances broken the solemn promises made when he subscribed to the creed. If investigation shall substantiate these charges against Professor Smyth, he must not only relinquish all hope of going to the orthodox heaven, but, what is of greater consequence to him, he will be called upon to resign his position and forfeit a large and comfortable salary.

IN the dust of the earth are all the faces of Montreal's pious folks. Some time ago a man named Portreas attended a service in a Catholic church. At a certain point in the ceremonies he was ordered by a constable to go upon his knees—both knees. Owing to stiffness of the joints he was unable to comply, and for his disability he was fined eight dollars. He brought an action for damages against the constable, but a jury has now brought in a verdict against him. The priests run Montreal, and the inhabitants are not likely to forget the fact.

PEOPLE who hav read the reports of the recent Congress of the American Secular Union furnished by the daily press will hardly believe that the spirit of George Washington rests down upon the reporters of this city. Washington could not tell a lie. It seems that some of the reporters can, and, fortunately, most people can tell a lie, too—when they see it in print.

THE torch on Bartholdi's statue of Liberty remains in darkness because no provisions hav been made for lighting it. Perhaps this is well, but if the people of Morris county will erect a statue of Reynolds Enlightening New Jersey, we would be willing to contribute something to keep its torch illumined.

An Experience in Practical Politics.

Perhaps it would be entertaining and instructiv to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER living outside New York to know how the will of the sovereign people finds expression here on election day, and how the business at the polls is conducted. Perhaps, also, it will be instructiv, if not altogether entertaining, to those living inside the metropolis. To make everything clear to all as we go along, I might say that New York city is divided into twenty-four assembly districts, each district containing from 4,000 to 16,000 voters. Assembly districts are subdivided into from twenty to forty election districts. Previous to election day all those who intend to vote must register their names and addresses in their election district with a board of registration which sits four days to receive them. The board consists of four members, one of whom is chosen chairman, and each of whom has a blank book in which the names and addresses of the voters are taken down.

The board of registration usually meets in a cigar-store. On election day a plank is run across the front of the store a few feet back from the entrance, and the boxes to receive the ballots are placed in a row on this plank. Behind these, at a table, are supposed to sit the inspectors with their books open before them. When a sovereign elector appears for the purpose of exercising the franchise, the inspectors turn to his name in their books, and as soon as his ballot is cast they write in a line with the name the word "Yes" to show that he has voted. With the inspectors sit also two poll-clerks, who, in blank books lined and ruled for that purpose, write the name and address of the voter, and check off the name of the office to which his vote is designed to elect a candidate. At the closing of the polls the books of the inspectors and the poll-clerks should of course agree as to the whole number of votes cast for each office balloted for. When the votes are counted, they should correspond with the totals indicated by these books. After the ballots are counted, they are put back into the boxes. The boxes are locked and sealed and deposited with the head of the police department. The books of the inspectors and poll-clerks are delivered to various city and county officials, and their tallies go to police headquarters and to the mayor.

Such is the machinery, and in the hands of honest and competent persons it would seem as if mistakes and fraud were almost out of the range of possibility.

It was my luck this year to be appointed poll-clerk in an up-town election district. The sum of $7.50 for a day's work had an attraction for me. I filled out the preliminary blank application by writing down my name, address, and occupation, and saying Yes to the questions whether I had ever supported the County Democracy and whether I expected to repeat that offense at the coming election. A month afterward I "qualified" by going into a pen with a hundred others at police headquarters, writing my name in a book, and holding up my right hand while John J. O'Brien "swore" us in in a lump. Two days before election a police officer placed in my hands a paper certifying that I had been, "in pursuance of chapter 410 of the laws of 1882, selected, approved, qualified, and duly appointed a poll-clerk," for a specified election district, and designating the street and number where the election was to be held.

Half past five o'clock on the morning of November 2d found me at my post laboring under a due sense of the responsibility which I had shouldered. The place was open, and the ballot-boxes were in position. Leaning sleepily upon these, was a short, fat, red-faced, half-befuddled young man. I may as well say here that he was chairman of the board of inspectors. I gained a place at a table behind the boxes by crawling under the plank. At this table sat a small man wearing a high hat and a gray mustache. He was drumming impatiently on the table, and looked very much disgusted. I hunted up my blank book, and prepared for business. The two other inspectors shortly appeared, one being a tough youth from the "Fourt' ward," and the other a well-meaning young man who appeared to be more or less depressed from lack of sleep. My fellow poll-clerk came just before six o'clock. He was a west-side corner statue. Every remark he made during my acquaintance with him he prefaced with "holy Jeeses," and his vocabulary was made up of unintelligible slang.

With the polls thus manned we were prepared to begin the work of receiving votes for the men who were to preside over the destinies of New York for the next two years. The gentleman with the gray mustache had a watch that told the correct time, and when it was six o'clock by his watch and my own we suggested that the polls be declared open. The chairman produced a brassy-looking timepiece about the size of a regulation canteen, and having regarded it unsteadily for some time announced that six o'clock was still five minutes in the future. His decision stood, and so did the expectant voters. At five minutes past six our chairman braced himself against the ballot-boxes, and remarking, "Well, here she goes," got off a rigmarole beginning, "Hear ye! hear ye! hear ye!" and to giv his announcement the proper religious twist he closed with a "So help you God," that was absurdly out of place, and is nowhere included in the prescribed ceremony.

The first man who voted was a drunk. I remember his name, but it is not necessary to giv it here. He was with us all day, growing drunker as time passed on. He accompanied each voter to the polls. His presence everywhere reminded me of the ubiquitous monkey in Mr. Heston's pictures. This man peddled ballots in the room, "contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided," and though two policemen were present he was in no instance interfered with. He made himself a further nuisance by occasionally shouting, "He votes all," or "All but the canal"—the "canal" being a facetious name for the convention to revise the constitution, when it is proposed to make the canals free. This was especially annoying to the poll-clerks.

At a few minutes past six our chairman disappeared and was not seen again until toward noon. He properly should hav received the ballots and placed them in the boxes, and then checked them in his register. As things went, his book was neglected. The gentleman with the gray mustache took the chairman's place, with the Fourt' ward tough as his assistant. Then there was confusion, but by special activity the poll-clerks were enabled to keep a correct tally. The inspector who was suffering from lack of sleep finally retired to a back room and "corked off" on a sofa, as the west-side corner statue defined taking a sleep. This left a second inspector's book unattended to. The law requires that three at least shall be consulted and checked every time a ballot is cast.

I heard vague inquiries occasionally for "our supervisor," but saw nothing of that functionary until about ten o'clock. He then appeared and worked industriously for perhaps an hour, posting up his book from that of the poll-clerk next to him. He then, apparently, grew weary, for he went away. In the afternoon he came back and finished posting his book. At eleven o'clock I went out to vote and to lunch, and was gone half an hour. A few voters had balloted in my absence and I took the other clerk's book to copy from. Then he went away for two hours. I must giv him credit for tolerable accuracy, though I caught him in a half dozen errors that would hav made serious difficulties if uncorrected.

While my brother poll-clerk was absent some twenty-five votes were taken, which I duly chronicled, and which the corner statue copied on his return.

In the afternoon the policeman who, as required by law, was present at our polling-place, complained that the monotony of standing around was wearing upon him. He therefore retired to the back room, and, with the help of a small boy, "worked the growler" assiduously through a side door. A tenant of the house soon put a stop to beer being brought in through the side door, and thereafter the foaming beverage was carried through the polling-room. This took place under the eyes of two policemen, and most of the beer disappeared under the nose of one of them. The law on this subject says (sec. 1,924, chapter 410, Laws of 1882) that "whoever, during the sitting of any board of inspectors of election, shall bring, take, order, or send into any place of election any distilled or spirituous liquors whatever, or shall at any such time and place drink or partake of any such liquor, shall be deemed and held to be guilty of misdemeanor." The law was dodged by drinking the beer in the back room, but the bringing of it into the polling-place was a flagrant violation of the statute.

The policeman finally got full, and dropped off into a quiet doze. The tired inspector on the lounge had his sleep out, and went to work fixing his register. By dint of copying and inquiry, he got it done at last. Then the chairman happened to recollect that his book was behind. He therefore proceeded to check off a lot of names, and revised his work by comparison with the rest. Considerable erasing and one thing and another at length brought the registers to agree with the poll-list. Another source of great trouble arose from the slouchy way in which Mr. Martin B. Brown, city stationer and printer, had bound the registers. The lines on some pages "broke joints" with those on the pages opposit, so that when one man voted another man got the credit for it.

The law has made provision for the keeping of six lists of the voters. Only two can be said to hav been kept with any degree of accuracy in this case—namely, the lists of the poll-clerks. The four others were corrected by these, hours after the ballots which they recorded were cast. The supervisor's book was of no account, being merely a copy.

The hour for closing was four o'clock. The chairman's watch had gained ten minutes, and he insisted upon shutting out two voters who came after 3:55, but he received their ballots under protest. At this hour the chairman was apparently sober, in spite of the fact that he had drank more or less throughout the day! I am at a loss to understand it.

Counting the votes was the most creditable part of the day's performance. As a general thing the ballots agreed with our lists. An excess of one vote occurring on one of the counts, the chairman caused a ballot to be drawn from a pile jumbled together upon the table. He should hav returned a number of all the candidates' ballots to the box, and then drawn one. At another time the chairman, finding that I was a raw recruit, cautioned me that if my count differed in any wise from that of the other clerk, who had been there before, I should change my figures accordingly. No such exigency arose, and so the methods of forcing balances are still a mystery to me.

I hav no doubt that the results of the balloting in this election district, as we returned them to the proper officials, were tolerably correct, but there was plenty of room for errors to creep in.

What I find fault with is the character of the persons selected to take charge of the polls. Here was one inspector too drunk to properly attend to his duty, another was too sleepy. The policeman in charge was boozy; a drunken loafer was allowed to make himself a nuisance for ten hours undisturbed. The corner statue, the Fourt' ward tough, the supervisor, the sleepy inspector, and a political heeler who hung about the place, were demoralization personified. With the exception of the gentleman with a gray mustache, they were a bad lot. It is a degradation of the polls to place them in the charge of such men. If the board I served with is a fair sample of the eight or nine hundred other boards, I hav small respect for the report on the mayoralty election.

One object I had in view in writing this article was to make a suggestion. I do not expect our newly elected "saviors of society" will adopt it. The suggestion is this: That boards of registration and election should be composed of women as well as men. The duties are not beyond the capacities of any of a hundred thousand women in New York to whom the liberal pay would be a great help. I hav noticed that in the presence of self-respecting women, even toughs and loafers will act as much like gentlemen as they know how. I think too, that with a woman to receive the ballots fewer otherwise honorable men would scour their election district on election day to pick up "drunks" from the gutters, escort them to the polls, and hold them up while they vote.

My experience as a poll-clerk has made me heartily sick of the whole business. It has convinced me that not more than half the voters vote with any object in view, and that that object is likely to be lost through the carelessness, dishonesty, or incompetency of those who receive, record, and count the ballots.

GEORGE E. MACDONALD.

An Illinois Blasphemy Case Recalled.

I see that our Jersey people are still disposed to expose their ignorance and intolerant bigotry in carrying on their silly prosecution for blasphemy. This brings to my mind a blasphemy case we had here in this county some years ago. The Lenawee county Spiritualists were holding their annual grove meeting some twelve miles out from the city of Adrian, and there was a large crowd of all sorts of people present. The blasphemy case took place at the Sunday morning session, when the attendance was largest. The speaker was, and still is, a strong believer in a future life beyond the grave. He believed that, conditions being favorable, we may communicate with our friends of earth, and that the old Quaker agitator, Elias Hicks, was his control. This medium is known here as the Hollow Globe man. Well, he had the rostrum, and was speaking in his peculiar way, or, as he claimed, Elias Hicks was using his vocal organs to speak to the people with. In the course of his remarks he was telling the bear story, and he went on to repeat it about as we read it in 2 Kings ii, 23, 24. "Now," he said, "these little children did not mean to be ugly, and just said to this old man without hair on his head, 'Go up, thou bald-head; go up, thou bald-head;' and this old man turned back and looked on them and cursed them in the name of the Lord, and there came forth two she-bears out of the wood and tare forty and two of them. Now," he said (in his crude and vulgar way of speaking, which was peculiar to him—and he even claimed that this was the way that Elias Hicks had told him that he had to talk after he went to the other side) "that was a d——d fool of a God." These were the words that he was arrested for using, and which, it was claimed, constituted blasphemy. The leader in this prosecution was a very pious member of the Christian church. He came down to the city and laid in the complaint against the Hollow Globe man before his friend, an attorney at law, but the attorney advised him to go home and attend to his farm, saying that God was able to take care of himself. But this Christian man would not hear to this good advice, and had the case brought before the legal authorities, but as neither party was quite ready to go on with it, the case was adjourned over one week or so.

During this time word got out over the county that a blasphemy case was coming off in this city on a certain day. This, being a novel case, brought to town quite a crowd of Spiritualists and Liberals, many of them men of wealth, who had come prepared to meet the issue, if judgment should go against the defendant.

The hour for meeting had been set at 10 o'clock. As I had been at the grove meeting, and had heard what the defendant said, I was here at the law office to be ready to giv my testimony; but as the hour was passed and the prosecutor not making his appearance, I thought I would go out and see what the matter was. I had walked but a few steps on the sidewalk before I met his attorney, who asked me if I was at that grove meeting, and heard what the defendant said. I told him I was there, and heard it all. "Well," he said, "what did he say?" I then told him what, as I hav said here. Said he, looking up to the sky, "I don't suppose he meant to blaspheme the God of the universe." "Why, no, of course not," I answered; "it was this Bible God, the Jewish Jehovah, he was speaking of." Turning on his heel, he went directly up into his office, where he had left his client, and I went back into the law office, expecting that the prosecutor with his attorney would soon be in. The office was crowded, but no prosecutor made his appearance.

When the clock struck 11, the squire dismissed the case. It was then publicly announced in that office that on next Sunday, at 10:30 oclock, there would be a lecture at Rome Center (that is near to where this woods meeting was), on "Blasphemy," showing that the Christians' Bible is a blasphemous book. This lecture was had, to a good audience, and everything went off peaceably. In a few days after this, I called in at the office of this prosecutor's attorney to see why it was that he did not go on with the prosecution. "Well," he said, "when I had gone over to the squire's office, and seen the number of witnesses there on the other side, and knew them personally to be honest, upright men, and men of wealth, I could see fire in their eye against this prosecution as a religious humbug, and I made up my mind at once that the quieter it was settled the better it would be for our people at large and for our county funds in particular. And so I went back to my office, where the complainant was still waiting for me, and I told him that in my opinion he had better just drop this case, and quietly go home. At this he rebelled most firmly, and said that he was determined to go on with this thing, and defend the honor and glory of God. 'Well, now,' said I, 'I will quietly and kindly tell you, as an attorney-at-law, as well as your friend, that you may depend on being unsuited in this case, and knowing these men from different parts of this county in person and wealth as I do, you will be arrested on the spot for perjury; and if you can't get bail for your appearance at court, you will be taken to the county jail.' At this," he said, "the old man began to tremble. 'Now,' I said, 'I will tell you what to do—go right down the stairs and get in your buggy and drive off home as fast as you can,' and in a few minutes he was out of the city." And thus ended this blasphemy case.

Now, if the intelligent people of Morris county will put themselvs at once in array against this foolish and wicked prosecution, as we did here, the attorneys, seeing this, would most likely understand that a dismissal of the case was the better part of valor, both for the honor of the county and the saving of its funds, SAMUEL D. MOORE.

Adrian, Mich., Nov. 4, 1886.

Superstition and Pro-Slavery Morristown.

Now that Brother Reynolds has been indicted by a court sitting in Morristown for insulting a ghost, it revives in my mind a most wonderful history of ghostly proceedings that occurred in this same historic town near the close of the last century. A school-teacher from Connecticut named Rogers, tramping through the country, struck a job at school-teaching near that town. He was pious, as all school-teachers were in those days, and upon learning that a large sum of money had been buried in that vicinity by some ancient pirate, over which dark and gray spirits kept careful watch, he imparted to a select few the knowledge that he had power to soothe the said spirits, to pull the wool over their eyes, or in some manner to so coax, conciliate, lay out, or subdue them that the whole pile of this immense treasure could be secured. A secret company was formed composed exclusivly of church-members, no worldly-minded or sinful man being allowed to become a member, and negotiations were opened with the spirits. To appease them it was necessary to raise a certain amount of money, but Rogers, while seemingly willing to drive a sharp bargain with the spirits, was unable to keep their demands within reasonable bounds. Money in those days was very scarce, and many of the members were obliged to sell their cattle, horses, and in some instances their farms in order to raise the wherewithal to become partners in this fortunate band of holy men. Sometimes all the prerequisits would appear to hav been complied with, and they were within only a few hours of laying hands upon the millions that were ultimately to become theirs, when it would be discovered that some member had unwittingly said something or thought something that ran counter to the peculiar notions of the spirits, and they would hav to raise more money and do more praying before they could seize upon the promised treasure. It became necessary to take in more members, and careful search was instituted in all the surrounding towns to find godly men with sufficient lucre to join their number. Rogers had a confederate who played the part of a ghost, and, besides, he was an adept in the arts of chemistry and ingenious tricks whereby he practiced upon the credulity of his foolish victims. He was completely successful in his swindling scheme, for after obtaining all the money that it was possible to raise from his deluded followers, he suddenly disappeared and was never heard of afterward at Morristown.

The story of Rogers's exploits was published many years ago under the title of "The Wonderful History of the Morristown Ghost." It was written by David Young, of Hanover, an eminent astronomer of fifty years ago. The publication was bought up and destroyed by the descendants of the victims of that extraordinary affair. Seventy-five years ago Morristown had not ceased to be jeered and laughed at by other portions of the country in consequence of this imposition upon her "best citizens," but it is not unlikely that the same game could hav been just as successfully played in other places at that time.

I once resided in Morristown, and know something of her history. Some forty-five years ago there came to that town a gentleman with a foreign name, which I cannot now repeat, who opened out as a barber. His shop was a model of beauty and neatness, and besides his tonsorial business he added a stock of notions adapted to his trade. He was of swarthy complexion, with intelligent features and manly beauty. He had a wife, and two or three bright children of fair complexion. He joined the Baptist church, and he and his family became regular attendants. In due time the antislavery agitation broke out, and then it was discovered, or suspected, that our dusky barber was a nigger. There was not the least appearance of the African taint in wife or children, and it was not to be suspected in the husband unless special attention was called to it. There arose a row in the church. The barber was invited to withdraw. He declined, insisting with considerable intelligence and true courage that he had been faithful in all his obligations as a member, and he denied the African taint. To an outsider it was a rumpus to be enjoyed. The doctrins of the "meek and lowly Jesus" were exemplified after a manner peculiarly modern. Many of the pious brothers and sisters were horridly shocked when they came to learn that they had knelt in prayer at the same altar with a nigger. But the battle is always with the strong. The innocent barber was expelled and thrust out from a communion with the saints. He had a hard road to travel. His trade fell off. He was denounced as a fraud of most atrocious character. The idea of a man with African blood in his veins coming into a peaceable and Christian community, such as Morristown was known to be, and setting himself up as a white man, joining the church, and otherwise conducting himself as white men do, was not only cheek and impudence of immense proportions, but it was an offense that should hav been, but unfortunately was not, punishable by fine and imprisonment. Possibly this offense might hav come under the laws against blasphemy if it had been thought of, but, as it was not, other means were resorted to in the punishment of the "insolent nigger." Respectabte people avoided his shop. His doors and windows were daubed with filth and mud. He had a beautiful sign and pedestal which stood at his door. One night it was painted all over with a dull leaden color, and was thus ruined. On one occasion I remember to hav seen piled about his front door all the loose rubbish that could be found in the town, which had been done the night previous by the vicious boys of the town. He strove against fate. At last he succumbed, sold out, and moved away.

Two or three years prior to the departure of this persecuted man there had been erected in the central part of the village, facing the public green, a grand hotel, which was the delight and pride of the town people. This elegant structure embraced several beautiful storerooms, and, to round out and complete the grand enterprise, a most alluring grog-shop, with costly mirrors, elaborate paintings, and tempting liquors, was opened out in one of its rooms.

It was soon discovered that men who were formerly strangers to strong drink were now indulging freely in the grand saloon of the building, and there began to arise a prejudice in the minds of the sober portion of the community against the whole institution, and the opinion was freely expressed that, instead of the building being of any benefit to the town, it was proving to be a great curse. One night the building was discovered to be in flames, and before morning it was totally consumed, accompanied by the loss of one life, a man named Bailey.

It was very evident that the fire was the result of no accident. The people settled down into the belief that some temperance fanatic, maddened with the thought that the saloon was ruining the young men of the town, had fired the building. The hotel was not rebuilt, but the block was divided and sold and business houses erected thereon. Some years later there came to the town a report that the poor, persecuted barber had died in another state, and before dying had confessed that to avenge his wrongs he had himself set fire to this building. The Animus of the Prohibition Party.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: As the writer of this brief essay was presented quite recently with the compliments of the Connecticut Prohibition State Committee, together with the names of its political candidates for office, and coöperation with its and their aims and objects invited, he feels called upon to utter his unqualified and determined dissent to many of those aims and objects as set forth in its platform.

And, first, I would note the fact that the adoption of the resolutions by the regularly elected delegates of the Prohibition State Convention at Hartford, July 28, 1886, by the unanimous rising vote of the three hundred voters, is made to appear to be all fair and honest in its expression of each individual's views as to its final results. But looking behind these preliminary acts, it will be readily seen that their views might hav been previously forecast, and such being held by them, and pledged to do the bidding of their leaders, decided their election as delegates.

Now, the first resolution declares: "The Prohibition party of Connecticut, in convention assembled, acknowledges almighty God as the rightful sovereign of all men, whose laws are supreme, from whom the just powers of government are derived, and by whom governments are ordained for a terror to evil-doers, and for the protection and comfort of those who would do well."

In this first resolution these delegates hav assumed to know all about the character and attributes of almighty God as if they had each and all been personally admitted to his counsels and perfectly understood his divine will. And now, having acquired such wonderful knowledge, they are assuming the prerogativ of placing all men under their God's government. It shall be acknowledged supreme law over the life and conduct of all other men. And if they ever get the acknowledgment of their God into the Constitution of the United States of America, that instrument, which has hitherto protected the rights and liberties of American citizens, both nativ and adopted, then it will become a source, and a fruitful source, of plague, of misery, of destruction of the people's natural rights and liberties, instituting at once and forever in this land of freedom a political despotism—a despotism ready to shout aloud the divine rights of kings to rule free, intelligent men. America's freedom-loving souls fought a long, arduous seven years' war to throw off a galling, kingly yoke, and by their own determined will succeeded in establishing a government by the people and for the people. A constitutional government is established to hold in check the bigotry of those who would fasten chains of slavery upon this people through pretense of a piety and an intemperate advocacy of temperance by law, which, as we hav seen, and their own statistics show, hav increased drunkenness rather than diminished it; and thus in great degree frustrated and destroyed the good results sought to be accomplished by moral suasion. For history shows that man will not permit his fellow-man to dictate to him what he shall or shall not eat or drink.

But vastly more absurd and preposterous is the idea that any one man or body of religious fanatics can be competent to formulate a religious standard or creed for all classes of men in this country and expect them to subscribe to its tenets or indorse them. Such would be at once demanded by the party of that iniquitous measure which has been publicly declared shall become the supreme law of these United States, and that this people shall become a Christian nation.

The enactment of such a law, or the unmaking of the Constitution, would fill all our jails to overflowing with all such as would dare to assert their own right to worship God according to the dictates of their own light of reason.

But any political party's God is not a safe political governor, for he might, and doubtless would, at one fell swoop enslave this entire nation. We do, therefore, earnestly protest against this proposed alliance of church and state as a foul usurpation of humanity's inalienable rights and liberties held under the present Constitution—the supreme law.

Let the people rule themselvs, and then will peace and happiness supplant tyranny. E. P. GOODSELL.

A LAY SERMON.

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S ADDRESS BEFORE THE CONGRESS OF THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: In the greatest tragedy that has ever been written by man—in the fourth scene of the third act—is the best prayer that I have ever read; and when I say "the greatest tragedy," everybody familiar with Shakspere will know that I refer to "King Lear." After he has been on the heath, touched with insanity, coming suddenly to the place of shelter, he says:

I will pray first, and then I will sleep.

And this prayer is my text:

Poor naked wretches, wheresoe'er you are,
That bide the pelting of this pitiless storm,
How shall your unhoused heads, your unfed sides,
Your looped and windowed raggedness, defend
From seasons such as this? Oh, I have ta'en
Too little care of this. Take physic, pomp;
Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel,
That thou may'st shake the superflux to them,
And show the heavens more just.

That is one of the noblest prayers that ever fell from human lips. If nobody has too much, everybody will have enough!

I propose to say a few words upon subjects that are near to us all, and in which every human being ought to be interested—and if he is not, it may be that his wife will be, it may be that his orphans will be; and I would like to see this world, at last, so that a man could die and not feel that he left his wife and children a prey to the greed, the avarice, or the necessities of mankind. There is something wrong in our government where they who do the most have the least. There is something wrong, when honesty wears a rag, and rascality a robe; when the loving, the tender, eat a crust, while the infamous sit at the banquets. I cannot do much, but I can at least sympathize with those who suffer. There is one thing that we should remember at the start, and if I can only teach you that, to-night—unless you know it already—I shall consider the few words I may have to say a wonderful success.

I want you to remember that everybody is as he must be. I want you to get out of your minds the old nonsense of "free moral agency;" then you will have charity for the whole human race. When you know that they are not responsible for their dispositions, any more than for their hight; not responsible for their acts, any more than they are for their dreams; when you finally understand the philosophy that everything exists as an efficient cause, and that the lightest fancy that ever fluttered its painted wings in the horizon of hope was as necessarily produced as the planet that in its orbit wheels about the sun—when you get to understand this, I believe you will have charity for all mankind.

Wealth is not a crime; poverty is not a virtue—although the virtuous have generally been poor. There is only one good, and that is human happiness; and he only is a wise man who makes himself happy.

I have heard all my life about self-denial. There never was anything more idiotic than that. No man who does right practices self-denial. To do right is the bud and blossom and fruit of wisdom. To do right should always be dictated by the highest possible selfishness. No man practices self-denial unless he does wrong. To inflict an injury upon yourself is an act of self-denial. To plant seeds that will forever bear the fruit of joy, is not an act of self-denial. So this idea of doing good to others only for their sake is absurd. You want to do it, not simply for their sake, but for your own; because a perfectly civilized man can never be perfectly happy while there is one unhappy being in this universe.

Let us take another step. The barbaric world was rewarded for acting sensibly. They were promised rewards in another world, if they would only have self-denial enough to be virtuous in this. If they would forego the pleasures of larceny and murder; if they would forego the thrill and bliss of meanness here, they would be rewarded hereafter for that self-denial. I have exactly the opposite idea. Do right, not to deny yourself, but because you love yourself and because you love others. Be generous, because it is better for you. Be just, because any other course is the suicide of the soul. Whoever does wrong plagues himself, and when he reaps that harvest, he will find that he was not practicing self-denial when he did right.

Now, then, as I say, if you want to be happy yourself, if you are truly civilized, you want others to be happy. Every man ought, to the extent of his ability, to increase the happiness of mankind, for the reason that that will increase his own. No one can be really prosperous unless those with whom he lives share the sunshine and the joy.

The first thing a man wants to know and be sure of is when he has got enough. Most people imagine that the rich are in heaven, but, as a rule, it is gilded hell. There is not a man in the city of New York with genius enough, with brains enough, to own five millions of dollars. Why? The money will own him. He becomes the key to a safe. That money will get him up at daylight; that money will separate him from his friends; that money will fill his heart with fear; that money will rob his days of sunshine and his nights of pleasant dreams. He cannot own it. He becomes the property of that money. And he goes right on making more. What for? He does not know. It becomes a kind of insanity. No one is happier in a palace than in a cabin. I love to see a log house. It is associated in my mind always with pure, unalloyed happiness. It is the only house in the world that looks as though it had no mortgage on it. It looks as if you could spend there long, tranquil autumn days; the air filled with serenity; no trouble, no thoughts about notes, about interest—nothing of the kind; just breathing free air, watching the hollyhocks, listening to the birds and to the music of the spring that comes like a poem from the earth.

It is an insanity to get more than you want. Imagine a man in this city, an intelligent man, say with two or three millions of coats, eight or ten millions of hats, vast warehouses full of shoes, billions of neckties, and imagine that man getting up at four o'clock in the morning, in the rain and snow and sleet, working like a dog all day to get another necktie! Is not that exactly what the man of twenty or thirty millions, or of five millions, does to-day? Wearing his life out that somebody may say, "How rich he is!" What can he do with the surplus? Nothing. Can he eat it? No. Make friends? No. Purchase flattery and lies? Yes. Make all his poor relations hate him? Yes. And then, what worry! Annoyed, his poor little brain inflamed, you see in the morning paper, "Died of apoplexy." This man finally began to worry for fear he would not have enough to live clear through.

So we ought to teach our children that great wealth is a curse. Great wealth is the mother also of crime. On the other hand are the poor. And let me ask, to-night, Is the world forever to remain as it was when Lear made his prayer? Is it ever to remain as it is now? I hope not. Are there always to be millions whose lips are white with famine? Is the withered palm to be always extended, imploring from the stony heart of respectable charity, alms? Must every man who sits down to a decent dinner always think of the starving? Must every one sitting by the fireside think of some poor mother, with a child strained to her breast, shivering in the storm? I hope not. Are the rich always to be divided from the poor,—not only in fact, but in feeling? And that division is growing more and more every day. The gulf between Lazarus and Dives widens year by year, only their positions are changed—Lazarus is in hell, Dives is in the bosom of Abraham.

And there is one thing that helps to widen this gulf. In nearly every city of the United States you will find the fashionable part, and the poor part. The poor know nothing of the fashionable part, except the outside splendor; and as they go by the palaces, that poison plant called envy springs and grows in their poor hearts. The rich know nothing of the poor, except the squalor and rags and wretchedness, and what they read in the police records, and they say, "Thank God, we are not like those people!" Their hearts are filled with scorn and contempt, and the hearts of the others with envy and hatred. There must be some way devised for the rich and poor to get acquainted. The poor do not know how many well-dressed people sympathize with them, and the rich do not know how many noble hearts beat beneath rags. If we can ever get the loving poor acquainted with the sympathizing rich, this question will be nearly solved.

In a hundred other ways they are divided. If anything should bring mankind together it ought to be a common belief. In Catholic countries that does have a softening influence upon the rich and upon the poor. They believe the same. So in Mohammedan countries, they can kneel in the same mosque, and pray to the same God. But how is it with us? The church is not free. There is no welcome in the velvet for the rags. Poverty does not feel at home there, and the consequence is, the rich and poor are kept apart, even by their religion. I am not saying anything against religion; I am not on that question; but I would think more of any religion, provided that even for one day in the week, or for one hour in the day, it allowed wealth to clasp the hand of poverty and to have, for one moment even, the thrill of genuine friendship.

In the olden times, in barbaric life it was a simple thing to get a living. A little hunting, a little fishing, pulling a little fruit, and digging for roots—all simple; and they were nearly all on an equality, and comparatively there were fewer failures. Living has at last become complex. All the avenues are filled with men struggling for the accomplishment of the same thing.

Emulation hath a thousand sons that
One by one pursue; and if you hedge from
The direct forthright, they, like an entered tide,
All sweep by and leave you hindmost. Or, like
A gallant horse, fallen in the front rank,
You become pavement for the abject rear.

The struggle is so hard. And just exactly as we have risen in the scale of being, the per cent of failures has increased. It is so that all men are not capable of getting a living. They have not cunning enough, intellect enough, muscle enough—they are not strong enough. They are too generous or they are too negligent; and then some people seem to have what is called "bad luck"—that is to say, when anything falls, they are under it; when anything bad happens, it happens to them.

And now there is another trouble. Just as life becomes complex and as everyone is trying to accomplish certain objects, all the ingenuity of the brain is at work to get there by a shorter way, and, in consequence, this has become an age of invention. Myriads of machines have been invented—every one of them to save labor. If these machines helped the laborer, what a blessing they would be! But the laborer does not own the machine; the machine owns him. That is the trouble. In the olden time, when I was a boy, even, you know how it was in the little towns. There was a shoemaker—two of them—a tailor or two, a blacksmith, a wheelwright. I remember just how the shops used to look. I used to go to the blacksmith shop at night, get up on the forge, and hear them talk about turning horse-shoes. Many a night have I seen the sparks fly and heard the stories that were told. There was a great deal of human nature in those days! Everybody was known. If times got hard, the poor little shoemakers made a living mending, half-soling, straightening up the heels. The same with the blacksmith; the same with the tailor. They could get credit—they did not have to pay till the next January, and if they could not pay then, they took another year, and they were happy enough. Now, one man is not a shoemaker. There is a great building—several hundred thousand dollars' worth of machinery, three or four thousand people—not a single mechanic in the whole building. One sews on straps, another greases the machines, cuts out soles, waxes threads. And what is the result? When the machines stop, three thousand men are out of employment. Credit goes. Then come want and famine, and if they happen to have a little child die, it would take them years to save enough of their earnings to pay the expense of putting away that little sacred piece of flesh. And yet, by this machinery we can produce enough to flood the world. By the inventions in agricultural machinery the United States can feed all the mouths upon the earth. There is not a thing that man uses that can not instantly be over-produced to such an extent as to become almost worthless; and yet, with all this production, with all this power to create, there are millions and millions in abject want. Graneries bursting, and famine looking into the doors of the poor! Millions of everything, and yet millions wanting everything and having substantially nothing!

Now, there is something wrong there. We have got into that contest between machines and men, and if extravagance does not keep pace with ingenuity, it is going to be the most terrible question that man has ever settled. I tell you, to-night, that these things are worth thinking about. Nothing that touches the future of our race, nothing that touches the happiness of ourselves or our children, should be beneath our notice. We should think of these things—must think of them—and we should endeavor to see that justice is finally done between man and man.

My sympathies are with the poor. My sympathies are with the workingmen of the United States. Understand me distinctly. I am not an Anarchist. Anarchy is the reaction from tyranny. I am not a Socialist. I am not a Communist. I am an Individualist. I do not believe in tyranny of government, but I do believe in justice as between man and man.

What is the remedy? Or, what can we think of—for do not imagin that I think I know. It is an immense, an almost infinite, question, and all we can do is to guess. You have heard a great deal lately upon the land subject. Let me say a word or two upon that. In the first place I do not want to take, and I would not take, an inch of land from any human being that belonged to him. If we ever take it, we must pay for it—comdemn it and take it—do not rob anybody. Whenever any man advocates justice, and robbery as the means, I suspect him.

No man should be allowed to own any land that he does not use. Everybody knows that—I do not care whether he has thousands or millions. I have owned a great deal of land, but I know just as well as I know I am living that I should not be allowed to have it unless I use it. And why? Don't you know that if people could bottle the air, they would? Don't you know that there would be an American Air-bottling Association? And don't you know that they would allow thousands and millions to die for want of breath, if they could not pay for air? I am not blaming anybody. I am just telling how it is. Now, the land belongs to the children of Nature. Nature invites every babe that is born into this world. And what would you think of me, for instance, to-night, if I had invited you here—nobody had charged you anything, but you had been invited—and when you got here you had found one man pretending to occupy a hundred seats, another fifty, and another seventy-five, and thereupon you were compelled to stand up—what would you think of the invitation?

It seems to me that every child of nature is entitled to his share of the land, and that he should not be compelled to beg the privilege to work the soil, of a babe that happened to be born before him. And why do I say this? Because it is not to our interest to hav a few landlords and millions of tenants.

The tenement house is the enemy of modesty, the enemy of virtue, the enemy of patriotism. Home is where the virtues grow. I would like to see the law so that every home, to a small amount, should be free not only from sale for debts, but should be absolutely free from taxation, so that every man could have a home. Then we will have a nation of patriots.

Now suppose that every man were to have all the land he is able to buy. The Vanderbilts could buy to-day all the land that is in farms in the state of Ohio—every foot of it. Would it be for the best interest of that state to have a few landlords and four or five millions of serfs? So, I am in favor of a law finally to be carried out—not by robbery, but by compensation, under the right, as the lawyers call it, of eminent domain—so that no person would be allowed to own more land than he uses. I am not blaming these rich men for being rich. I pity the most of them. I had rather be poor, with a little sympathy in my heart, than to be rich as all the mines of earth and not have that little flower of pity in my breast. I do not see how a man can have hundreds of millions and pass every day people that have not enough to eat. I do not understand it. I presume I would be just the same way myself. There is something in money that dries up the sources of affection, and the probability is, it is this: the moment a man gets money, so many men are trying to get it away from him that in a little while he regards the whole human race as his enemy, and he generally thinks that they could be rich, too, if they would only attend to business as he has. Understand, I am not blaming these people. There is a good deal of human nature in us all. You remember the story of the man who made a speech at a Socialist meeting, and closed it by saying, "Thank God, I am no monopolist," but as he sank to his seat said, "But I wish to the Lord I was!" We must remember that these rich men are naturally produced. Do not blame them. Blame the system!

Certain privileges have been granted to the few by the government, ostensibly for the benefit of the many; and whenever that grant is not for the good of the many, it should be taken from the few—not by force, not by robbery, but by estimating fairly the value of that property, and paying to them its value; because everything should be done according to law and in order.

What remedy, then, is there? First, the great weapon in this country is the ballot. Each voter is a sovereign. There the poorest is the equal of the richest. His vote will count just as many as though the hand that cast it controlled millions. The poor are in the majority in this country. If there is any law that oppresses them, it is their fault. They have followed the fife and drum of some party. They have been misled by others. No man should go an inch with a party—no matter if that party is half the world and has in it the greatest intellects of the earth—unless that party is going his way. No honest man should ever turn round and join anything. If it overtakes him, good. If he has to hurry up a little to get to it, good. But do not go with anything that is not going your way; no matter whether they call it Republican, or Democrat, or Progressive Democracy—do not go with it unless it goes your way.

The ballot is the power. The law should settle these questions—between capital and labor—many of them; but I expect the greatest good to come from civilization, from the growth of a sense of justice; for I tell you, to-night, a civilized man will never want anything for less than it is worth—a civilized man, when he sells a thing, will never want more than it is worth—a really and truly civilized man would rather be cheated than to cheat. And yet, in the United States, good as we are, nearly everybody wants to get everything for a little less than it is worth, and the man that sells it to him wants to get a little more than it is worth, and this breeds rascality on both sides. That ought to be done away with. There is one step toward it that we will take: we will finally say that human flesh, human labor, shall not depend entirely on "supply and demand." That is infinitely cruel. Every man should give to another according to his ability to give—and enough that he may make his living and lay something by for the winter of old age.

Go to England. Civilized country they call it. It is not. It never was. I am afraid it never will be. Go to London, the greatest city of this world, where there is the most wealth—the greatest glittering piles of gold. And yet, one out of every six in that city dies in a hospital, a workhouse, or a prison. Is that the best that we are ever to know? Is that the last word that civilization has to say? Look at the women in this town sewing for a living, making cloaks that sell for $45, for less than forty-five cents! Right here—here, amid all the palaces, amid the thousands of millions of property—here! Is that all that civilization can do? Must a poor woman support herself or her child, or her children, by that kind of labor and do we call ourselves civilized? Did you ever read that wonderful poem about the sewing woman? Let me tell you the last verse:

Winds that have sainted her, tell ye the story
Of the young life by the needle that bled,
Making a bridge over death's soundless waters
Out of a swaying, soul-cutting thread—
Over it going, all the world knowing
That thousands have trod it, foot-bleeding, before:
God protect all of us, should she look back
From the opposite shore!

I cannot call this civilization. There must be something nearer a fairer division in this world.

You can never get it by strikes. Never. The first strike that is a great success will be the last strike. because the people who believe in law and order will put it down when they think it approaches success. It is no remedy. Boycotting is no remedy. Brute force is no remedy. This has got to be settled by reason, by candor, by intelligence, by kindness; and nothing is permanently settled in this world that has not for its corner stone justice, and is not protected by the profound conviction of the human mind.

This is no country for Anarchy, no country for Communism, no country for the Socialist. Why? Because the political power is equally divided. What other reason? Speech is free. What other? The press is untrammeled. And that is all that the right should ever ask—a free press, free speech, and the protection of person. That is enough. That is all I ask. In a country like Russia, where every mouth is a bastile and every tongue a convict, there may be some excuse. Where the noblest and the best are driven to Siberia, there may be a reason for the Nihilist. In a country where no man is allowed to petition for redress, there is a reason, but not here. This—say what you will against it—this is the best government ever founded by the human race! Say what you will of parties, say what you will of dishonesty, the holiest flag that ever kissed the air is ours!

Only a few years ago morally we were a low people—before we abolished slavery—but now, when there is no chain except that of custom, when every man has an opportunity, this is the grandest government of the earth. There is hardly a man in the United States to-day of any importance, whose voice anybody cares to hear, who was not nursed at the loving breast of poverty. Look at the children of the rich. My God, what a punishment for being rich! So, whatever happens, let every man say that this government, and this form of government, shall stand.

"But," say some, "these workingmen are dangerous." I deny it. We are all in their power. They run all the cars. Our lives are in their hands almost every day. They are working in all our homes. They do the labor of this world. We are all at their mercy, and yet they do not commit more crimes, according to number, than the rich. Remember that. I am not afraid of them. Neither am I afraid of the monopolist, because, under our institutions, when they become hurtful to the general good, the people will stand it just to a certain point, and then comes the end—not in anger, not in hate, but from a love of liberty and justice.

Now, we have in this country another class. We call them "criminals." Let me take another step. It is not enough to raise the feeble up. We must support them after. Recollect what I said in the first place—that every man is as he must be. Every crime is a necessary product. The seeds were all sown, the land thoroughly plowed, the crop well attended to, and carefully harvested. Every crime is born of necessity. If you want less crime, you must change the conditions. Poverty makes crime Want, rags, crusts, failure, misfortune—all these awake the wild beast in man, and finally he takes, and takes contrary to law, and becomes a criminal. And what do you do with him? You punish him. Why not punish a man for having the consumption? The time will come when you will see that that is just as logical. What do you do with the criminal? You send him to the penitentiary. Is he made better? Worse. The first thing you do is to try to trample out his manhood, by putting an indignity upon him. You mark him. You put him in stripes. At night you put him in darkness. His feeling for revenge grows. You make a wild beast of him, and he comes out of that place branded in body and soul, and then you won't let him reform if he wants to. You put on airs above him, because he has been in the penitentiary. The next time you try to put on airs over a convict, let me beg of you to do one thing. Maybe you are not as bad as I am, but do one thing: think of all the crimes you have wanted to commit; think of all the crimes you would have committed if you had had the opportunity; think of all the temptations to which you would have yielded had nobody been looking; and then put your hand on your heart and say whether you can justly look with scorn and contempt even upon a convict. None but the noblest should inflict punishment, even on the basest. Society has no right to punish any man in revenge—no right to punish any man except for two objects—one, the prevention of crime; the other, the reformation of the criminal. How can you reform him? Kindness is the sunshine in which virtue grows. Let it be understood by these men that there is no revenge; let it be understood, too, that they can reform. Only a little while ago I read of a case of a young man who had been in a penitentiary and came out. He kept it a secret, and went to work for a farmer. He got in love with the daughter, and wanted to marry her. He had nobility enough to tell the truth—he told the father that he had been in the penitentiary. The father said, "You cannot have my daughter, because it would stain her life." The young man said, "Yes, it would stain her life. therefore I will not marry her." He went out. In a few moments afterward they heard the report of a pistol, and he was dead. He left just a little note saying: "I am through. There is no need of my living longer, when I stain with my life the ones I love." And yet we call our society civilized. There is a mistake.

I want that question thought of. I want all my fellow-citizens to think of it. I want you to do what you can to do away with all unnecessary cruelty. There are, of course, some cases that have to be treated with what might be called almost cruelty; but if there is the smallest seed of good in any human heart, let kindness fall upon it until it grows, and in that way I know, and so do you, that the world will get better and better day by day.

Let us, above all things, get acquainted with each other. Let every man teach his son, teach his daughter, that labor is honorable. Let us teach our children: it is your business to see that you never become a burden on others. Your first duty is to take care of yourselves, and if there is a surplus, with that surplus help your fellow-man; that you owe it to yourself above all things not to be a burden upon others. Teach your son that it is his duty not only, but his highest joy, to become a home-builder, a home-owner. Teach your children that by the fireside is the real and true happiness of this world. Teach them that whoever is an idler, whoever livs upon the labor of others, whether he is a pirate or a king, is a dishonorable person. Teach them that no civilized man wants anything for nothing, or for less than it is worth; that he wants to go through this world paying his way as he goes, and if he gets a little ahead, an extra joy, it should be divided with another, if that other is doing something for himself. Help others help themselves.

And let us teach that great wealth is not great happiness; that money will not purchase love; it never did and never can purchase respect; it never did and never can purchase the highest happiness. I believe with Robert Burns:

If happiness have not her seat
And center in the breast.
We may be wise, or rich, or great,
But never can be blest.

We must teach this, and let our fellow-citizens know that we giv them every right that we claim for ourselves. We must discuss these questions and have charity, and we will have it whenever we have the philosophy that all men are as they must be, and that intelligence and kindness are the only levers capable of raising mankind.

Then there is another thing. Let each one be true to himself. No matter what his class, no matter what his circumstances, let him tell his thought. Don't let his class bribe him. Don't let him talk like a banker because he is a banker. Don't let him talk like the rest of the merchants because he is a merchant. Let him be true to the human race instead of to his little business—be true to the ideal in his heart and brain, instead of to his little present and apparent selfishness—let him have a larger and more intelligent selfishness, not a narrow and ignorant one.

So far as I am concerned, I have made up my mind that no organization, secular or religious, shall own me. I have made up my mind that no necessity of bread, or roof, or raiment shall ever put a padlock on my lips. I have made up my mind that no hope, no preferment, no honor, no wealth, shall ever make me for one moment swerve from what I really believe, no matter whether it is to my immediate interest, as one would think, or not. And while I live, I am going to do what little I can to help my fellow-men who have not been as fortunate as I have been. I shall talk on their side, I shall vote on their side, and do what little I can to convince men that happiness does not lie in the direction of great wealth, but in the direction of achievement for the good of themselves and for the good of their fellow-men. I shall do what little I can to hasten the day when this earth shall be covered with homes, and when by the fireside of the world shall sit happy fathers and mothers and children.

THE New York World is looking up the untaxed personal property of residents of this city. It finds millions of this sort of property, but has not yet discovered the more millions of real estate belonging to religious organizations which never pay a cent of taxes.

THE column which Pope Pius IX. ordered to be erected in commemoration of the Ecumenical Council of 1870 has just been completed. It will be placed in front of the Vatican Museum at Rome. It was the Ecumenical Council of 1870 which made the important discovery that Pius IX. was infallible.

Letters from Friends.

WOODSTOCK, VT., Nov. 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I see there is a call for money, which is wanted to defray the expenses of the Tenth Annual Congress. Not begging it—it is a demand, and no other than right, and a duty we owe to ourselvs and to the world, that we come out liberally, and show to the world that we mean to sustain our cause.

I cannot do now any more at this than to send you $5. I hav soon to pay to different ones who are working hard for the cause that we espouse. JOHN D. POWERS.

MERIDEN, TEX., Oct. 28, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav had all the bad feelings that Mrs. Helen Wilman's expressed in her letter to her friend, and hav had them ever since 1861. I was a Union man, and opposed to secession. I had to flee my home to save my life. The secessionist would not, or could not, reason with a Southern raised man. The limb and rope were always ready for him if the infuriated mob caught him. For Mr. Truesdell's benefit, I will tell of one Union man who was caught (his crime was avoiding the army) in Bell county, Tex. As soon as he was caught, the cry was raised, "Hang him to a limb." The report that came back to his family was that he (Clark Naile) was hung, not by the neck, but the heels, just like a hog, and left in that situation to die.

I am opposed to hanging a man by the neck for anything. That is the least punishment we can inflict.

Fred Koezly writes like a man. He can reason and does not seem to be scared. Fear is a hard master. I will write myself an Anarchist—one that has grown into it from bad treatment. S. D. GREER.

CERESCO, MICH., Oct. 31, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am very glad to congratulate you on the successful publication of THE TRUTH SEEKER. You certainly deserve all the patronage of Freethinkers, which I hope you will get. I am decidedly, however, against Anarchism. Without the law there would be no living. The Anarchy in the Bible will some day destroy the Bible. See the thirty-first chapter Numbers. "Anarchy;" see the New Testament, "You believe in me, or go to hell and be damned." Anarchy again. But Talmage and all his ilk think Anarchy in the Bible is all right. What superstition can do! You giv us the pictures; they are grand. At the end of the year put them in a book and sell them; they will sell. And also John Peck's this year's contributions. They will sell too and help Freethought.

Inclosed find catalog for books and postal order for the same. I am sorry I can't get you some subscribers, but here are less than two hundred people, and they hav got four churches. Poor Ceresco—ridden to death.

THOMAS KNIGHT.

NEW YORK, Nov. 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The recent Episcopal Convention which has been held at Chicago, comprising over sixty bishops, and about four hundred prominent ministers and laymen, ought to be at least noted by Freethinkers.

A group of laymen, at one of the prominent hotels in that city, were discussing the virtues and defects of the various diocesan bishops. One gentleman said that "there was, at least, one bishop (Gillespie) who had no heart, and was a complete iceberg, although he made great pretensions to being a philanthropist." This gentleman said he drove away our late rector, who was beloved by the whole city, and especially workingmen and Freethinkers, by freezing him out. He said that he had known him to receive persons and say he was glad to see them, when, but a few days before, he had written a letter that was enough to hang them. What confidence can we hav in such hypocritical bishops? He never knew what forgivness is, and he recited a number of cases to demonstrate that his treatment of various persons was the most barbarous he ever knew. He would make a good Bishop Bonner, according to all that was told.

CHARLES CRUMMEY.

NEWARK, N. J., Oct. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Is it not degrading and humiliating to the poor to see creatures made after their maker's image dressed up in livery with brass buckles on their hats to designate the poor man from the rich? I hav seen those aristocrats who hav more money than brains, drive up to a fashionable church and go in to hear the preacher preach faith in God, hope in immortality, and charity for all mankind, and leave their poor servants out before the door dressed up like monkeys, in winter beating their hands and stamping their feet to keep them from being frozen. When I look and see those steeples, hooped up with lightning-rods to keep their God's thunder from knocking down those churches, I hav often thought there was more danger for those nincompoops to get struck than those churches. Such people are a nuisance; they should leave this country for their country's good, and go to Europe and liv under and be governed by emperors or kings, for a republican form of government is not suited to their high fangdangle notions. They hav forgotten that their grandsires fought a monarchical and aristocratic government for liberty, equality, and justice

After the war of independence the rich and poor all mingled and associated together. The rich would go to church in calico and linsey woolseys, and if there were any that strayed away from the path of virtue, gentle words of encouragement were offered to him or her to retrieve their standing in society. In those days there was no highfalutin religion, no sensational preachers like Talmage. There were no cathedrals with millions; there were no such notices as this posted on church doors, "A single sitting at mass, ten cents." There was no ten, twenty, or thirty thousand dollars per year paid for preaching Christ's unadulterated religion. There was no sale of pews. There were no fashionable dames with penciled eyebrows, lips painted, face powdered, hair dyed, and a jockey hat and feathers on their heads, and the wrinkles puttied up with paste. This specimen is the modern improved Christian. Better go back to pagan religion. Instead of paying missionaries to convert the heathen, the heathen should convert the Christians.

MINDEN, LA., Nov. 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav seen mention in two different numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER of recent date of a Liberal life insurance company. Such an institution, I feel, would be of inestimable value. The majority of us, both men and women, are of the working class, and are unable to meet the requirements of the regular insurance companies financially, and hav not the time to join and attend the secret organizations, such as Knights of Pythias, even if our lack of positiv knowledge of a personal God would not exclude us. I am inclined to think that many Freethinkers who are not now identified with us would avail themselvs of such an institution, and work publicly for the cause, buy Liberal literature to read and distribute, and take an interest in their brother Liberals, if they could invest in a cheap and reliable means of providing for their families after death, who now are depriving themselvs of such Liberal food to lay up something for emergencies.

If you deem these remarks worthy of a space in your valuable paper, they may be the means of inducing some more able pen than mine to advocate a "Secular Union Mutual Life Insurance." Thanking Mr. E. W. Miner and the other writer, whose name I do not now remember, for their valuable suggestions and introducing the subject,

Very truly yours, WM. MANSFIELD.

BUTLER, PA., Oct., 29, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am now an old man. I hav felt for many years the persecution of Christian friends on account of my exercise of that freedom of thought dictated by nature, and guaranteed by our Constitution. I hav no word of unkindness for those who differ with me in opinion or belief about matters unknown to anyone. But I feel more happy, more noble, and more in the path of duty reading the truths in your paper, than I could possibly feel reading the brutal history and unnatural creeds of the Dark Ages.

To be close to God in death, we must walk with him in life. And I prefer to die alone in the path of truth, seeking after more, than to be dragged to the tomb, in a holy chariot stained with the blood of the reformers and philanthropists of every age, by a sanctified crew that seek to crush to hell every father and mother, brother and sister, who refuses to ride in their bloody wagon.

Yesterday we had a very nice parlor lecture on the "Logic of Modern Science," by J. L. Andrew, of Kansas. The lecture was delivered at Nixon's Home. The Methodist Episcopal clergyman was present, but would not reply. The conflict is between science and superstition, and the former must prevail, for reason teaches that truth is the only thing that can stand the test of time. I inclose five dollars. Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years to A. CUTHBERT.

LEXINGTON, MO., Nov. 2, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: If Mr. Walker and Miss Harman are married at common law, then the agreement of the former to the latter as to control of her person is of no use to her in law; she is as to that in precisely the same situation that any other married lady is. Usually people become better than the law before the law is changed, and so it must be in this matter. Such an arrangement can only be "honor bright" between the two. If, then, the lady can gain no right in law, why not be content with making that part of the agreement privately, or with friends as witnesses? And where is the harm of notifying the public of the marriage by record as we do in less important matters? In respect to third parties, the Walker-Harman contract seems to me obscure, a fatal error.

The deeper one will study life, the more does the conclusion force itself on one that one man and one woman are each for the other for life, and any other arrangement transgresses a law of nature. The facilities that true Rationalism will giv for extensiv acquaintance and thereby finding the true partner will eventually prevent many mistakes such as are now made—mismating.

I lately saw an article in your paper by Ella E. Gibson that constrained me to write a private letter of thanks to the author.

Purity in the home, justice and order in the state—I offer that as the watchword of Rationalism. If there are many who cannot subscribe to that, I predict fission and differentiation in the Liberal organism. GEORGE WILSON.

ORANGE, N. J., Nov. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: On Sunday, by invitation of a friend, I went to attend a session of "The Reform Club," in Orange, N. J., which is a city of about thirty thousand inhabitants, having one hundred and thirty saloons, and is a regularly built hotbed of orthodoxy. Yet there are scores of Infidels and Liberals in Orange (all estimable citizens) who dare not utter their own philosophical and scientific thoughts. At the session of "The Reform Club" I found that it was composed almost entirely of a few shouting Methodists, a leader of the Salvation Army, and a smaller number of Baptists. The hall was well filled with anxious hearers, hungry and thirsty for a few grains of truth. A good Methodist clergyman, who (I verily believe) is a true Infidel, led off in a ranting, tearing, and impractical harang on the subject of temperance and Prohibition. Said he: "Some great men fall from their integrity and greatness and go down into a drunkard's grave. Thomas Paine was a great man. He was a distinguished writer, an eminent statesman, and he did a great deal for our country. But he died a cursing Infidel, and a miserable drunkard. I know he did, for my father, before he died, told me so, and my father was told so by a man who knew Paine. So that I do know, without any doubt, that this great man died a miserable drunkard." All the singing, the prayers, and the incoherent and irrelevant talk were replete with "Jesus and Jerusalem." I fear if any Liberal should open his mouth here he would meet the fate of friend C. B. Reynolds on account of his reformatory efforts at Boonton. Yet the mills of God are grinding, grinding, grinding, and intelligent people are thinking and reflecting. I hav heard that same Presbyterian falsehood about Thomas Paine for more than fifty years past. I am a thorough temperance man. I never take even a social goblet of wine or cordial of any sort. But, twenty-four years ago, I took a three-cent glass of lager beer as a medicin, and it made me drunk—so drunk that I did not know whether it was winter or summer. After I am dead and gone, no doubt my pious Presbyterian friends will say that I died a cursing Infidel and a miserable drunkard. ESS E. TEE.

DIANA, TEX., Oct. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Two months hav passed, during which time I hav been reading your excellent paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, at your expense. The term for which I had paid expired at a time when money is very scarce in this part of the country, especially so with your humble servant, who could not hav bought a gangway plank, had steamboats been selling at five cents apiece; and now I am happy to be able to ask you for credit for the inclosed, and to thank you for continuing the paper with the illustrations, which teach important lessons to those who hav minds to comprehend them. I hav circulated your paper to some extent, with the hope of getting a subscriber, but it is hardly possible to get one in this community, composed largely of church-going hypocrits and disinterested nothingarians. However, I will continue to hand the paper to those who I think will read it to be benefited.

There was a time when I, like the Christian, believed that Christianity was a God-given religion, but, by investigation, I found that I had no evidence for such belief. I hav come to know that, like all other religions, it is of human origin. A religion founded on fable and mythology can't be true, nor can I believe it.

I cannot renounce reason, which is a beter guide than fear, for any kind of superstitious religion. To me it is surprising that such men as Talmage and Sam Jones can't see the error of their way. I believe they are what they are for the money; but "every dog has his day," and theirs will soon pass away.

It would be for the good of the race if such men as Mr. Peck could liv two hundred years. Everybody ought to read his writings. Yours truly, J. M. WOODS.

P.S.—Since writing the above, I hav learned that one Rev. Charlie Coppage, Jr., a pious scoundrel, of Coffeeville, Upshur Co., and a Methodist circuit rider, has been justly hauled up by the members of his church for whipping and otherwise maltreating his wife, and by them silenced from preaching. While he was off on his circuit, conducting "distracted" meetings, and faring sumptuously every day at the tables of his dupes, his wife was at home suffering for that on which he was growing fat. But, if he was called by the Lord, as he claims, to preach the everlasting truth, why not let him preach? Whipping his wife has nothing to do with his preaching. Is that the way they are to decide who is called and who is not? This claim made by the preachers is false, and men of sense know it. Oh, how long will the dupes of superstition let these pious frauds impose on them?

HARPER, KAN., Nov. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am always glad to discuss social questions with anyone who will do so in a kind spirit. Mr. Griffith's criticism of my views on the liquor question is good, and to the point. He wastes no room with wind and bombast, but states his objections clearly and briefly.

Here in Kansas we hav what is called Prohibition, but the name is not appropriate; it is really restriction. When I came to this state, two and a half years ago, no person could buy any kind of alcoholic liquors without a prescription from a physician. For writing these, physicians could charge prescription fees, and there were always plenty of needy physicians ready to make money in this way. The law did not work satisfactorily, and it was changed so that any person can go into a drug store and fill out a blank, stating the object for which the liquor is wanted, and the druggist will let him hav it. This is called Prohibition. But it is really restriction. Its sale is restricted to druggists, all of whom are getting rich by selling it.

Now, my plan would be to restrict its sale, but not to druggists or to doctors, but to salaried officers of the government. I would hav them placed under strict rules, for the violation of which they should be expelled from office. I would hav the liquor sold at the cost of manufacture and sale, and I would hav each government agent appointed over a certain territory, and made responsible for the drunkenness in his territory. He should be authorized to suppress the sale by anyone else in his territory.

Mr. Griffith says we might as well murder people by law. Indeed, we do this, and hav done it from time immemorial. We hang people who should be hung by law (and sometimes some who shouldn't). This is all I contend for. Let us sell liquor by law to those who should hav it for medicinal, sacramental, or other proper purposes. But let us be careful not to sell it except for proper purposes. This, I believe, we never can do so long as its sale is restricted to those who make money by selling it.

Mr. Griffith thinks we might as well steal by law. I think I might define stealing to be the taking of property by any person or persons to which said person or persons hav no right of claim. If this is a correct definition of stealing, then I think we steal a great deal by law. Our custom house officials, according to this definition, are the hired thieves of the government. They collect some three hundred millions of dollars a year that the government never earned and never inherited, and to which they hav no higher or other claim than that of might.

Yes, Mr. Griffith, our government does "take control of the stealing and killing department, and employs agents to steal from the people, and to kill such citizens as might be troublesome to their neighbors." Governments should raise public revenues by taxes upon public property, as land, mines, etc.—natural things. All taxes upon private property, products of labor, must be considered as stolen. It is the public taking what they hav no claim to. J. G. MALCOLM.

SQUAW CREEK, IDA., Oct. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Yours of recent date duly received. Yes, I want the paper to keep coming. Pictures I do not object to in the least. Those who object to them put me in mind of the young lady complaining of the boys bathing in a neighboring pond. Her modesty was shocked. She was told that her eyesight must be very good to see so long a distance. "Oh," she says, "I keep a telescope." I hope when Brother Heston gets around to the man after God's own heart and has him in his ball-room attire he will do him full justice; also Aholah and Aholibah, beautiful for the perusal of children in a school-room in a public school! Inclosed are $7—$3 for myself and $3 for the subscription of Mrs. Mary E. Lippincott, Columbia Falls, Maine, and $1 for Reynolds's defense against border ruffianism. A. G. CHURCH.

KANSAS CITY, MO., NOV. 3, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Will some one kindly inform us what Mr. E. C. Walker is fighting for? Not for the principles of free love or free love marriage surely, for he claims an ironclad, bullet-proof legal marriage. So far as free love principle is concerned, he surrendered at the first shot. I am surprised to see so many old free lovers getting excited over this affair. They seem to think that they hav treed a coon, but when they hav cut the tree down they will find to their disgust that there is no coon in it—not even a measly 'possum. It is a mere quibble as to the best form for a legal marriage, a dispute as to the difference 'twixt tweedledum and tweedledee. If, as Walker claims, the form is not essential, what is the good of fighting about it? Better fight for something that is essential.

The fracas reminds me of the senseless wrangle among Christians about the form or mode of baptism. Walker's form of marriage, like the Presbyterian form of baptism, is undoubtedly the best, because there is less of it. But the game is scarcely worth the ammunition. He loaded up for a bear and fired off at a chipmunk. T. WETZEL.

MR. EDITOR: All formal and ceremonial religious worship that mankind has ever indulged in is merely the childish toys of an undeveloped race or people. It is natural in all ages and conditions of mankind to query as to the origin and destiny of the human race, and to imagin or conceive a God or creator to whom reverence is given, and hence worship as a religion is the outgrowth. But as mankind, by the freedom and exercise of the reasoning faculties, outgrows the necessity of those childish toys, and looks at the natural world from a more rational standpoint, he then ceases to be a worshiper of an imaginary creator or God, and commences his progress in the light of a student or scientist in the workings or principles of nature. Although church worship and the religion of Jesus, so called, is still popular with the masses, but greatly divided up into creeds and factions, yet each standard-bearer, or faction, claims that they hav the simon-pure article, and if you travel their route, that when you pass over, heaven will be fitted up and prepared for you, and you will hav nothing to do but to step in and hang up your hat.

Now for the sequel: if a man would bring children into the world and then pay no attention to them, giv them no education, but neglect them and let them grow up like wild beasts, he would be looked on by all civilized people as a very unworthy parent, and certainly we should expect as much from a heavenly as an earthly parent. And I for one will make the move (if some one will second the motion), "That, if there is a personal God or creator, we demand self-evident and undeniable evidence, and that he make a resonable excuse or apology for the long delay in not giving us the facts." DUTTON MADDEN.

A LETTER TO A CHRISTIAN.

CONCORD, KY., Oct. 28, 286.

DEAR FRIEND: This term friend might at first hav the appearance of a solecism, a blending, you might say, of the sublime and ridiculous, so sharp and bitter is the antagonism between Infidelity and Christianity; but happily humanity sometimes gets the better of opinions, and we become in this case, just what we should be, generous and deferential. Should I, however, chance to wound your feelings, please to remember it was done inadvertently, and I propose as the amende honorable to give you the same privilege.

I hav several motivs in writing to you, the chief one being to correct a few of the errors under which you are laboring, thereby removing much of that prejudice which is such a barrier to seeing things in their true light. Many of the charges formerly alleged against Infidelity for the purpose of intimidating the timid, hav to-day no more effect upon the intelligent than a nursery tale. The horrible stories of death-bed repentance almost daily find a refutation at the death-bed of Infidels. The ravings of remorse, the recantation, and lastly the prayers for forgivness, hav all become so stale and hackneyed that the minister, who with such a gusto of eloquence relates them, but reflects his own ignorance, and, save from the most benighted, get only sneers for his pains. Another favorit way of keeping the lines intact is by telling the congregation that Infidelity is composed of the proletariat, the refuse of society, or, to use a still more expressiv term, the "off-scourings." We hav a peculiar admiration for this plea, coming as it does from the meek and lowly followers of the meek and lowly Jesus. It is in keeping with the general character of Christians to practice what they don't profess, and profess what they don't practice. When Christ was upon earth, according to history, he was distinguished by just such a following as are so odious to his followers to-day. Perhaps you will tell us that his condition has vastly improved since his advent here; that he is no longer a wandering vagrant with a few fishermen for his companions; but, residing in a city of palaces, seated upon a "golden throne," and wielding the scepter of the universe, you will feel in duty bound to support the dignity of character or rather his exalted position. Jest may not become a subject so grave, but when so many palpable facts contradict assertions so false we feel that the means are not wholly unwarranted. When every Christian's child must be taught from Infidel text-books; when Christians are constantly availing themselvs of the advantages of Infidel steam, the printing-press, the steamboat, the railroad; when our best literature bears upon its every page the impress of Infidelity, while greatest scholars of every age hav borne the brand—were every language sifted to show the meanness, the sensclessness, and the falseness of such accusations, there would still be an ellipsis.

Carlyle said he was glad his mother was religious, that is to say, credulous, submissiv, pliant to theological instruction, and considerably defectiv in reasoning power. This, perhaps, is why religion in women has been so much extolled. Simplicity, confidence, a beautiful dependence, are all very charming, we know. We hav a few such women in our mind's eye now, old, faded, neglected, and miserable, repining, and regretful, the past holding all their treasures, and that gone irrevocably. A sad commentary upon the comforting power of religion is age, and all due to the teachings of the pulpit! Whenever we can convince women that there is an elixir in Freethought, we shall not want for accessions, and gentlemen who prefer going to heaven by proxy will hav to go begging instead. There is nothing so hurtful to the mind as the doctrins of Christianity. While development and improvement is the very nature of Freethought, the Christian, starting out with a few formulated opinions, forbidden to partake of the tree of knowledge, his mind becomes dwarfed, his moral nature vitiated, all tending to nurture his weaknesses, until at last he finds himself bereft of everything but piety and dotage. One serious objection to Christianity is, that it inspires fear. There is no courage in it except that courage which it requires to make a coward—courage to forfeit our honesty, our integrity, our self-respect, and our right to investigate. This religion has made ours a nation of Esaus. He (Esau) sold his birthright for a mess of pottage, but we, more improvident still, hav given ours away. The editor fears for his subscription list, the attorney for his list of clients; the political aspirant must conserve his popularity, and the business man his patronage, while all fear Mrs. Grundy, of all fears the least pardonable. Always weak and capricious, now superannuated and imbebil, she can impose no penalty but ostracism, which is but driving us from the vain, frivolous, and superficial to the intellectual, the vigorous, and the strong.

I hav given you a few facts upon which to ponder. I hav no hopes of suddenly making a convert of you. Our conversions come by slow and regular process. It takes time, study, and reflection to persuade that of all religions Freethought is the best, the happiest, and the most beautiful. When once convinced of this, there will really be no need of persuasion. It will be like coming out of the labyrinth of darkness into the glowing light of day. You will then see that the theology that you hav been courting is but mythology after all, and must in time share the fate of its predecessors. VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., Oct. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The church of the present day is the source of little harm beyond that of narrowing men's minds and hearts down to one plane of thought and insisting that this must be the only plane; one plan, and this the only plan; one hope, and this the only hope. This stand taken by the church is utterly distasteful to the intellectually inclined—to the thinker and the philosopher. Variety is the source of all joy. Monotony is bred by the long continuance of any one thing. We must hav variety or we die, intellectually as well as physically. This the church cannot allow—she must enforce her laws to the letter; her precepts and doctrins must be protected at the cost of intelligence, of manhood, of self-respect. If she fail in any instance to thus protect herself, she falls. It is a well-known fact that the church has ever been the foe of science, of intellectual advancement, of everything which tends to lift the mind from superstition and place it upon the highway of intelligence and enlightenment. So far as that is concerned—according to the Bible as recorded in Genesis—our good foreparents were damned for nothing less than seeking knowledge. For why should they not wish to know good and evil? This knowledge should be very beneficial to anyone. And yet Jehovah was opposed to their having any enlightenment on the subject, and for this one offense they fell from grace, dragging with them all mankind into the depths of degradation and superstition, and God's so-called holy church, be it Roman Catholic or Protestant, has with its iron hand and darkened visage opposed all advancement, either in thought or precept, ever since. Intellects which are confined to the narrow precincts of her allotted range grow feeble and wither for want of proper sustenance. Some men, it seems, are not noble enough, not men enough, to be honest for the mere sake of honesty, not bold enough to do right for the sake of right principles and courageous enough to shun evil for the reward of a temperate and upright life. But they must hav some restraining power, some wonderful influence, brought to bear upon them, some strength of doctrin or creed, some law of which they stand in awe. And this is all that will control them for the better part of life. Some hope of reward; some hell to avoid, some evil power to combat in imagination; some fiend, breathing fire; some Satan clothed with subtlety and cunning. And without these they are supposed to be utterly lawless and uncontrolable. But let me say that when Christianity, with all her hell-fires; her devils, breathing fire and smoke; her miraculous conceptions and revelations; her Jehovah, the tyrant and bigot; her saviors so meek and lowly; and her plans, creeds, doctrins, and dogmas, fail, as is clearly the case, to restrain the masses from crime and to protect life and property, it is then time to try a new method. If in the face of all these horrors men can yet sin as though they knew not of punishment or reward, then let us turn to the pages of Freethought and receive a lesson which has been delayed full many a day too long. Let us cease to preach that Jesus saves us from sin or damns us for it. Let us cease to offer a reward for righteousness or declare a hell prepared for vice. Let us teach the truth that all men were created free and equal; that all must take their chance in the course of life; that whatsoever a man sows that shall he also reap; and the wages of sin are death. For, as the great apostle of religious liberty has said, there are no rewards or punishments in nature, but simply consequences. Thus, if a man sins, he must of a necessity reap what he sows as a natural consequence. And if he sows in this world, it seems to me to be very probable to suppose that he will reap in this world also. If these things were taught simply, in place of all that tends to enchain the reason rather than to promote the welfare of mankind, the world would be much better off than it is at present. But I hav a certain hope that men will not always pay tribute to the miraculous, and, in many cases, the ridiculous; that mankind shall not always bow at the feet of ignorance and superstition, and that in some future day all systems of religion will hav passed away to giv place to a higher power, the power of reason.

For in the church of the present day I see full many a change, and many a wrinkle that in younger days she possessed not. The signs of age are visible, and with them I behold also the signs of decay. The church loses ground as fast as she givs up the doctrin of narrowness and confinement to one principle. Whenever she accedes to the demands of her devotees for higher thoughts, newer views, and broader themes—more universal topics—she adds a spike to her own cross and a new letter to her epitaph. Compare, if you will, the church of to-day with the church of a hundred years ago. To day she is an infant, compared with the strong man of a century past. In a hundred years more she will hav ceased to control men's minds to any great extent. For the views of men are widening. The absolute power of the church of past centuries is weakened.

Men no longer consult the church when they make a move in government. They no longer confer with the church when they contemplate a change of state. Questions are weighed and decided by the light of reason to a much greater extent in this day than a few centuries back. She now controls but a part of the civilized world. Her domain is limited. Her glory is fading slowly but surely. Her sun poises far over in the west, and is rapidly declining. The zenith was reached back in the Middle Ages, when priests were regarded as demigods and tithes were the chief object of all worship; when men blindly gave away their intellects, their hopes, and their souls into the hands of crafty priests; when thought was clouded and ambition fettered by ignorance; when men were rather slaves to superstition than thinking, reasoning human souls.

But now she is old. Soon will sink the sun—soon will come the time, as in France, when she will sink below the horizon of honest thought to rise no more forever, leaving a blot upon the pages of history and a tarnish upon all the past. It is not the church of the present that we fight, but the doctrins of the church of the past, some of which hav lived unto the present and still pursue mankind with pertinent mien and purpose unmistakable. Of the church of the present, as of the church of the future, we hav nothing to fear. For the church has entered upon a higher plane of thought in some respects, and this great expanding is what will eventually kill her. The struggles of her many prisoners behind her bars of creed in their efforts to expand, to grow, to come forth upon higher places, to leave the filth of past creeds and dogmas, is what has weakened her down so much, and exactly that which has brought her to her present state of lethargy and impotency, and it is exactly that which will in the future cause her destruction.

See now the palsied hand of the church—how it trembles in its efforts to grasp and hold the power it so lately has lost—how wan and pale the hand appears as it is raised in remonstrance against the advance of fair science and liberty of thought—how feeble it seems in its attempts to hold back the expanding and strengthened natures of its late minions, who daily strive within the clutches of the tyrant which has held sway in the minds and hearts of the people for the last eighteen hundred years! See now how agitated she becomes when she beholds the advancing armies of new thoughts, strange truths, broadened intellects, under the banner of science and crowned and arrayed with the efforts and achievements of the grand minds of all ages, the vindicated truths taught and expounded in the past by martyrs, sages, and philosophers; the success of great projects which agitated the hearts and minds of noble souls in the past, with measured tread and uncompromising front. No wonder she grows pale and haggard with terror, no wonder that she raises her hand with vain remonstrance, for her doom is sealed. Her eyes behold the coming destruction upon the banners of the advancing host in words of fire inscribed: Death to all superstitions, obnoxious creeds, and degrading dogmas, and liberty of thought and speech to all mankind forever!

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

To My Books.

[Inscribed to E. Hortensia Harman.]

What care I if fair or ugly,
Perfect looks or incomplete?
Sitting here with thee so snugly,
Life to me is very sweet.

What care I if fortune miss me,
Summer friends refuse to greet?
To thee I turn from such dependence
Sure to find a welcomé sweet.

Though coarse my fare and rude my shelter,
All outside a waste appears;
Who could say with thee for solace,
"This is but a vale of tears?"

Constant friends, in shade or sunshine,
Who will say that life is vain?
With thee to dwell as boon companions,
I would liv this life again.

So what care I if fair or ugly,
Scant or plenty so 'tis meet?
Sitting here with thee so snugly,
Life to me is very sweet!

The King Who Went to Grass;

OR, ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL.

A New Version of an Old Story.

A grave and reverend bishop was once dining with the distinguished Sydney Smith, when, as the conversation lagged somewhat, a son of Mr. Smith broke the silence by asking the bishop the following question, What was the condition of Nebuchadnezzar when he returned from grass?

The bishop laughed solemnly, but returned no answer.

The above question caused the writer to investigate the history of the above-named king of Babylon, the result of which she is about to giv to you as a story founded on facts.

When a child, the touching refrain of,

Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Jews,
Sold all his old clothes, and all of his shoes!

often led the writer to inquire the reason of this penurious spirit in a king, and it is only of late that she decided it to be on account of the streak of latent madness in that once proud and powerful monarch.

Nebuchadnezzar was, when he reigned king of Babylon, as great and mighty as his name. He was born about 645 B.C., and died in the year 571. He was a great general as well as a king, and distinguished himself on many occasions. The captivs he brought home from the war were made to labor in the construction of gigantic walls, temples, palaces, aqueducts, and many public buildings. The bricks used were all stamped with his name, and some of them, as well as the remains of a portion of the magnificent buildings erected by him, are still in existence.

Everything Nebuchadnezzar did seemed to be on a large scale of magnificence, quite unequaled in history. Amyitis, his wife, who was a nativ of Media, was lonely away from her mountain home, and to please her, the king built the famous hanging gardens; they were four hundred feet high, being lifted by successiv terraces till they overtopped the city walls, and over all the terraces were made pavements of sheet lead, upon which earth was laid, and all kinds of flowers, vines, shrubs, and trees were rooted there. Water was drawn up from the river to moisten the plants, and the whole appeared like a mountain clothed with the loveliest roses and all kinds of blooming flowers. But, with all the beauty and grandeur by which she was surrounded, Amyitis did not liv long, but pined away and died, leaving one son named Evil-Merodach, and a daughter, whose name was Nitocris.

These children were brought up in great style, especially Nitocris, who was very lovely and accomplished. Her father was thirteen years besieging the city of Tyre, and there he obtained the rare Tyrian purple of which Nitocris had made for her the most beautiful and elegant robes and mantles. This princess was as sweet as a day in June, like one of those mornings when the skies are bluest, when the birds sing their sweetest songs, and the roses wear their brightest blushes.

Nebuchadnezzar loved Nitocris dearly, and so did all who had the pleasure of her acquaintance. She was skilled in the uses of the needle, and her father's kingly robes, as well as her own garments, were all embroidered with gold and silver by her own delicate fingers. She also played the lute and the dulcimer, and sang so sweetly that the birds in the trees hushed their songs to listen, and when she danced the captiv slaves hung their harps on the willows, and watched her graceful movements with sad pleasure.

Nebuchadnezzar was one of the greatest builders and schemers that ever lived. His busy brain was ever activ. He wanted to make this life one of beauty and delight, it being the only life he knew anything about. He enjoyed the good things of this world, and taught his children to enjoy them too; but, after the loss of his beloved wife, his spirits sank, and he was plunged in the deepest grief and sorrow. He was no longer buoyant and hopeful, and very soon he began to plunge into wild excesses. Revelry became with him the order, not only of the day, but the night also.

Nitocris became alarmed at the condition of her father, and knew not what to do

Among her suitors was a young man called Nabonadius, who had been initiated into several mystic orders, and was accounted something of a magician. To him Nitocris went with her grief. That night her father had been holding powerful carousals, and had made the very walls shake under the uproar and confusion. Nitocris remonstrated with him upon his conduct, but he flung her from him—the child he loved so well—saying, "Avaunt! you little goose, you!" and then kicked up his heels and scrambled under the bed. Nitocris sought counsel of her brother, Evil-Merodach, but he only laughed, and said, "Oh, let the governor go it!"

Then she sought the advice of Nabonadius. "O my friend!" she cried, wringing her delicate hands, things hav come to such a pass that unless some change comes over my poor old father, it will be no longer fitting for me to remain here. This is no longer a palace of beauty to me, and what shall I, what can I do? Can you, kind sir, help me in this dilemma?"

Nabonadius pondered awhile, and then replied: "Your papa, most noble lady, has been drinking heavily. Temperance lectures or a temperance pledge will be of no avail. If you will giv me permission, I will fix his royal majesty so there will be no further trouble, and eventually his character will become greatly improved."

"As you please, most noble sir," replied Nitocris; "but deal gently with the erring one."

"Be at ease," said Nabonadius; "he shall be most kindly led into the safe and pleasant paths of virtue."

He went directly to the king's apartment, with his magic wand, which was highly charged with electricity. Waving the same over the king's head, he made many mysterious passes, all the time muttering in an unknown tongue. Interpreted, it meant, "Go out to grass, Nebuchadnezzar; and stay seven years, Nebuchadnezzar!"

At the conclusion of the incantation, the king kicked up his heels and said, "Boo!" He appeared to become transformed into a grass-eating animal, and went out of that man's presence on all fours, nor was he seen again for seven years.

Nabonadius immediately commenced making love to Nitocris, and was married to her very soon after the disappearance of her father; and after the death of her brother, Evil-Merodach, she took the reigns of government in her own hands, and with Nabonadius reigned over the people of that kingdom.

Nebuchadnezzar in the mean time had been conveyed to a distant country, where he was unknown. He was not under the influence of liquor, as was supposed, but was laboring under a species of mild insanity known as lycantropy, where the subject believes himself to be a beast. Nebuchadnezzar thus supposed himself to be an ox, but Nabonadius was so superstitious that he thought he, with his magic wand, had thus transformed him into a beast of the field. The poor demented king lived out of doors, ate grass like an ox, trotted about on all fours, and was wet with the dews of heaven. His hair grew long like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws.

When the seven years were up his reason returned, and he began to brace up and think about going home. The people assembled in great multitudes to welcome him back, and to see what condition he was in.

Nabonadius alone was rather low-spirited, on account of the part he had taken in exiling the king.

Nebuchadnezzar was in such haste to reach his home, he started upon a run. He had worn hoofs and horns to carry out the ox idea, but they soon dropped off, and an old tramp, named B. L. Z. Bub, coming along, picked them up and put them on. They fitted him completely, so well, indeed, he could never get them off again, and it is reported that he is wearing them at the present time.

Nitocris met her father with great joy, and presented to him six little grandchildren that had been born in his absence, the band playing. "Lo, the Conquering Hero Comes!"

He embraced them all, and then they sat down to a gorgeous dinner of roast duck and boiled mutton, with apple dumpling for dessert. The king had a splendid appetite, and did not call for grass, although there were boiled dandelions on the table. After dinner, calling the little ones to him, the king said, "Come, my little darlings, and let grandpapa show you how to play oxen."

So down on all fours the children went with the king, and commenced, whackity whack, thumpity thump, all butting their heads together in true ox fashion, their mother and all the rest of the company shouting and screaming with laughter at the innocent sport. It was in this way that the exhilarating game of playing oxen first originated.

Nabonadius hid himself in the stable, fearing the reproof of his father-in-law. Nebuchadnezzar, however, called him in and readily forgave him his part in the little drama.

Nabonadius thereupon rushed out with the speed of a cyclone, upsetting several little Jews who were in the way, and, reaching the greensward, he executed a double sumersault. They had a great party to celebrate the return of the king, who danced the old-fashioned "fore and aft" dance, to the great glee of the grandchildren, who were permitted to sit up till ten o'clock to witness the festivities.

Nebuchadnezzar resumed his reign that night, and seizing a bit of chalk, he wrote over the principal entrance to the palace these memorable words, "All's well that ends well!" MIRIAM.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's 'What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

How Popular Papers are Made.

If you want to make a paper that the public will declare
The very best and brightest that is printed anywhere.
Just fill it up with lies and fun and scandal, filth and tattle—
For that's the kind of stuff that takes, and tickles human cattle.

Don't dare to call your soul your own—don't dare to hav a view
That isn't in accordance with the people's—if you do
They'll call you "fool" and "crank" because you hav more brains than they,
And know more in a minute than they all know in a day.

If they contend that black is white, chime in and say it's white;
And when you know they're in the wrong, proclaim them in the right;
And when they all unite to damn and down an honest man,
R ll up your sleeves, spit on your hands, and help them all you can.

Suppress your noblest thoughts, nor try to elevate the race;
Lie down and wallow with them in the mire of their disgrace;
And they in turn will honor you by calling you "the colonel,"
And take and pay spot money for your weak and worthless journal.

Thoughts On Prayer.

There is much in the solemnity of prayer which will for a long period hence keep the custom in popular exercise. Yet, however holy, sincere, and virtuous is its original impulse, it will, in its extreme unwise and farcical indulgence, fast degenerate into a nuisance or vice.

It has been observed that the lower in cultivation the human intellect, the louder and more vociferous are all religious enthusiasts; whether they are to be found in the most abject fetichism of the African, the howling dervishes of the Turks, the ravings of a Talmage, or the street evangelism of the Salvation Army. The impression with all seems to be the same. Heaven is to be taken by storm. It is also evident, per contra, that the higher the conception of the minuteness and vastness of creation, the muter are our appeals, until they sink into solemn, noiseless contemplation.

This species of auricular praying will for a long period hence be recognized and practiced—so long, indeed, as the Great Infinit is addressed as an immense personal being, a being possessed with feelings, that can be tickled with flattery, gratified with praise, or made furious with vengeance. Indeed, there are few of our religious bodies who hav outgrown the idea of an immense personality, as of one needing hints, advice, and assistance, and under this impulse it not unfreqently runs into the ridiculous, and often with a familiarity and childishness that would be a gross insult if addressed to an earthly friend.

We are reminded of an incident at a crowded hotel in Philadelphia, during the Centennial celebration. A number of visitors. mostly strangers to each other, were assembled in the sitting-room, at the termination of a crowded day, enter aining each other by describing the wonders they had just witnessed, and were relating events in their different homes. Their different stories were interesting, inasmuch as many were philosophical and practical, and many humorous and well told, and the bursts of laughter that followed readily indicated the happy feelings of the company. A mute kind of interregnum of a few minutes ensued, caused by the entrance of a clerical-looking gentleman. The solemnity of his visage was a visible damper upon the company, who were being entertained by a gentleman relating a grotesque occurrence to himself. The missionary, after giving a solemn glance around upon the company, proposed indulgence in prayer. Well, the prayer was made, and its impression may be imagined, for, soon after its close, the room was found emptied of its once cheerful company. The prayer was evidently out of place, and uncalled for.

We hav another sample. At a recent prayer-meeting in Brooklyn, in this section, prayers were fervently thrown up for the protection of the Christian brotherhood against the "increasing diabolism of Spiritualism, that modern Infidelity." Each pause of the good pastor to wipe his face with his silk bandanna, and to inhale a fresh supply of oxygen, was improved by some enthusiast by the interjection, coaxingly, as it were, sotto voce, "Do, Lord, do! Do!"

Now, nothing but pity for pueril simplicity (but evident sincerity) could suppress disgust at such silly familiarity.

Here is another instance of intimacy with the Great Infinit.

In a remote section of this Union, a farmer had several sons, one of whom had just recovered from the bite of a rattlesnake. He had, through fear of death and hell's awful certainty, become a "shining light," and been converted to Methodism. A class-meeting was to be held at the old farmhouse. The minister, good man, soon worked himself into a pious fervor, and also into a state of godly thankfulness for the past. The burden of his prayer was as follows:

"O God, we thank thee for sending us rattlesnakes! We appreciate their benefit in biting our thoughtless brother Philo, and thus offering him the means of grace and salvation. O heavenly father, continue the good work! Send a rattlesnake to bite Joe, to cure him of his ungodly, blood-curdling blasphemy. And, O God, send one of the biggest and loudest kind of rattlesnakes to bite the old man, for nothing but rattlesnakes, we fear, will save him from hell's everlasting flames. Amen!" D. Bruce.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Bible Myths, and their Parallels in Other Religions: Being a comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity, considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations. 1 vol. Royal 8vo. 567 pages. Cloth, $4.00.

The object of this work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then to trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning. It contains quotations from nearly all the sacred books of heathen nations, and from other rare and valuable works which are not accessible to people in general. The chapters are so arranged that it is a perfect cyclopedia of reference. Years of research would be necessary to discover all the information it contains. It is a most searching investigation into the origin of Christianity. Every fact is verified by copious notes and authorities, so that it may be trusted as a thoroughly reliable work. It contains information which will be startling to many.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

THERE was a slight labor riot in Stamford, Conn., last Saturday, created by some Italian laborers who had not been paid for four weeks.

THE Pro-Cathedral of St. Peter's, at Allegheny City, Pa., was destroyed by fire on the 13th; loss, $130.000. There was $40.000 insurance on the building.

THE Chicago Avenue church, better known as "Moody's church," in Chicago, was damaged $15.000 by fire on the 12th.

SUIT has been brought against Mayor Grace of New York to recover $150.000 which it is alleged he obtained through Ferdinand Ward of the firm of Grant & Ward. Grace was receiver of the firm.

A DELEGATION of New York school teachers waited upon Mayor Grace last Saturday, and urged him to appoint a woman school commissioner. The mayor promised to seriously consider the matter.

A WITNESS named Neal at Sioux City, Iowa, says that a saloon keeper attempted to hire him to kill the Methodist minister, Haddock, who was assassinated in July last during the prohibition excitement.

ABOUT 10.000 people visited the county jail at San Francisco on Friday night, the 12th, with the intention of lynching one Alexander Goldenson, who had brutally murdered a 14 year-old girl. A strong guard of police held the crowd at bay until the excitement subsided.

H. M. COLE, of Detroit, was a soldier in the late war. He contracted a chronic disease, and has been receiving a pension until recently, when he voluntarily relinquished this pension. He is a faith-cure believer, and explains his action on the ground that the Lord will provide for him. His sanity is questioned.

A NUMBER of English-Americans held a meeting in this city last Saturday night to make arrangements for celebrating the semi-centennial anniversary of Queen Victoria's accession to the British throne. Besides holding the celebration, it was proposed to erect on the highest point of land about New York Harbor a colossal statue of the queen one hundred feet higher than Bartholdi's Liberty. Erastus Wiman, the millionaire railroad man, is at the head of the movement.

THE Supreme Court of New Brunswick having prohibited the Methodist conference from further investigating the charges of betrayal and adultery preferred against Rev. D. D. Currie, the conference has unanimously voted to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, in order that the church courts may exercise godly disciplin over their members. Religious and legal circles are greatly exercised over this case, as it is the first time in Canadian church annals that the civil power has interfered with the church for disciplining its members for immorality.

Odds and Ends.

AFTER all it is the bad child that gets the palm.

AN Arkansas man made a bullet of a piece of plug tobacco and shot it through the body of a wildcat. The animal died. Here we hav another forcible illustration of the fatal effects of tobacco on the system.

SCENE—Polk Street Kindergarten. Teacher: "Now, children, silence and attention. Who made the world?" Eddie Jones (with uplifted hand): "The Creator." Front row of pupils, with chestnut bells: "Ting-a-ling-a ling."

"OH, yes," said the dealer; "I buy punched coins, but at a discount, of course. Do you come from some church?" "No, sir. Do you do much business with churches?" "Yes, that is my most valuable connection, particularly the Presbyterians."

A MINISTER was sent South from New Jersey a few years ago to labor among the colored people. They received him with many demonstrations of joy, and at the first meeting which he held one colored preacher prayed for him with great earnestness thus: "O Lord! Bless dis yer dear brudder what's come down from the Norf to preach de gospil to us. 'Noint him with the kerosene ile of salvashin, and set him on fire."

THE young man with bangs isn't always as idiotic as he looks. The son of a worthy Chicagoan had just returned from college. The father was a brusque, matter-of-fact man, who had no liking for anything dudish, and he noticed with sorrow that his son returned with bangs and various other insignia of dudedom. The old gentleman surveyed him critically when he appeared in his office, and then blurted out, "Young man, you look like a fool!" Just at that moment, and before the young man had time to make a fitting reply, a friend walked in. "Why, hello, George, hav you returned?" he asked. "Dear me, how much you resemble your father!" "So he has just been telling me," replied the youth.

"ALL GONA HELLA 'GEDDER."

It is a stately Italian who stalks majestically down Washington street with a two-decked board on his head, supported also upon his shoulders, which is covered with plaster of paris images of distinguished persons and of holy saints. To him comes a newsboy with papers under his arm and face expressiv of mischief, who deftly extends his foot before the Italian's toe. The latter trips, staggers, and falls full length, his precious board full of statuets crashing in a thousand pieces upon the sidewalk. Meanwhile the newsboy has disappeared up an alley.

It is a cruel loss to the image vender. His entire stock in trade is gone in an instant. He obeys the impulsiv instinct of his race, and, sitting down on the curbstone, givs way to a torrent of abuse and lamentations.

There arrives upon the scene a tender-hearted gentleman, buttoned up in a snug overcoat and wearing a glistening beaver. He takes in the situation.

"Did you lose them all?" asks the tender-hearted gentleman.

"Every one gona smash," sobs the Italian. "Me broka all up!"

"What did you hav on your board?"

"What I hav? Oh, I hav one Grova Cleveland, two Gen'al Grant, tree Garibaldi, tree Pio Nono' four St. Joseph, five St. Peter, six Virgin Mary—all gona hella 'gedder!"—Boston Record.

BILL SNORT, editor of the Crosby County Clarion, was in Austin, Tex., not long since, and was asked how about the state of morality in Crosby county since the local option law, forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquors, had gone into effect. "Why, there ain't a prisoner in the county jail. It is as empty as the head of the fellow who is trying to run an opposition paper to mine in Crosby county." "Is the vacant condition of the jail owing to the local option law?" "That's just it. The sheriff had to go over into an adjoining county to get drunk, and while he was gone all the prisoners—about twenty-seven in all—made their escape. Oh, I tell you local option is doing wonders for Crosby county."

A LITTLE girl and her mamma occupied seats in the parlor car of a Northwestern train. On board was a reverend gentleman—a very fat, sleek man—attired in a black coat, buttoned stiffly in front, and a white choker. Of course he had to strike up a conversation with the mamma—an interesting sort of a woman, by the way—by means of the little girl. Of missy he inquired if she attended Sunday-school and what lessons she remembered, and so on. In this way he learned that she had some curiosity concerning the ascension of the old patriarch in a chariot of clouds. "And now, my little girl," he inquired, "why couldn't I be taken bodily to heaven in a cloud as Elijah was?" "B—because," the little one rejoined, with her big eyes looking over the round and well-fed form of her questioner, "because you are not built that way."

LOVE IN A CHOIR.

There was a young maid in a choir
Who sweetly would sing of hell phoir;
  Of its terrors so dhoir
  To the wicked-souled lhoir,
And sinners who plunge in the mhior.

This sweet little maid of the choir,
The gallants did greatly admhoir;
  To her hand did asphoir,
  Wore the finest atthoir,
And swore to steer clear of hell phoir.

Alas! this sweet lass of the choir
Smiled sweetly on one in the mhoir
  Of unrighteousness dhoir,
  And she wedded a lhoir,
Regardless of hell and its phoir.

This shows that sweet love in a choir
Cares nothing at all for hell phoir,
  And the consequence dhoir
  Of a fall in the mhoir,
But mates with the love of a lhoir!

ficient to establish a miracle, be of such a kind that its more miraculous than the fact which it endeavors to establish. . . . When anyone tells me that he saw a dead man restored to life I immediately consider with myself whether it be more probable that this person should either deceive or be deceived, or that the fact which he relates should really hav happened. I weigh the one miracle against the other, and according to the superiority which I discover, I pronounce my decision, and always reject the greater miracle. If the falsehood of his testimony would be more miraculous than the event which he relates, then and not till then, can he pretend to command my belief or opinion.—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

IT is not enough for us, Americans, to felicitate ourselvs upon this resistless stream of progress, if our America is a sluggish eddy in that stream, cumbered with wrecks of mighty hopes and miserable froth of words, or if we ourselvs, instead of being hardy sailors on its tide, guiding some useful freight to distant havens, are only moral corpses which it bears along still breeding poison as we go. It is not enough for us that humanity shall go from better on to best. We want our own America to prosper. We do not want any future Gibbon to write the history of her decline and all. And it is not enough for us that America shall prosper. We want, or should want, to be plus and not minus quantities in the sum of national well-being.—Chadwick's Rise of Man.

THE plurality of worlds—the indefinit immensity of the universe—is a most awful subject of contemplation. He who rightly feels its mystery and grandeur is in no danger of seduction from the falsehoods of religious systems, or of deifying the principle of the universe. It is impossible to believe that the spirit that pervades this infinit machine begat a son upon the body of a Jewish woman, or is angered at the consequences of that necessity which is a synonym of itself. All that miserable tale of the devil, and Eve, and an intercessor, with the childish mummeries of the God of the Jews, is irreconcilable with the knowledge of the stars. The works of his fingers hav borne witness against him.—Shelley's Notes to Queen Mab.

FULL well I know the dead are dead,

THE doctrin of necessity teaches us that in no case could any event hav happened otherwise than it did happen, and that, if God is the author of good, he is also the author of evil; that, if he is entitled to our gratitude for the one, he is entitled to our hatred (or our pity?) for the other; that, admitting the existence of this hypothetic being, he is also subjected to the dominion of an immutable necessity. It is plain that the same arguments which prove that God is the author of good, light and life, prove him also to be the author of poison, darkness, and death. The wide-wasting earthquake, the storm, the battle, and the tyranny, are attributable to this hypothetic being in the same degree as the fairest forms of nature, sunshine, liberty, and peace.—Shelley's Notes to Queen Mab.

I ONCE asked an ingenious English painter how he could bring himself to leave Rome after living so many years there. "It was, indeed, very painful," he replied, "to tear myself away from so much exquisit beauty; but as my children grew up, it became absolutely necessary, for I found it utterly impossible to giv them a notion of truth at Rome." The terrible curse which is represented in the words of the ancient satirist, "Quid Romæ faciam? Mentiri nescio (What can I do at Rome? I cannot tell a lie," seems still to cleave to the fateful city."—Hare's Guesses at Truth.

DEEPER, deeper, let us toil
  In the mines of knowledge;
Nature's wealth and learning's spoil
  Win from school and college;
Delve we there for richer gems
Than the stars of diadems.
—James Montgomery.

As young men, when they knit and shape perfectly, do seldom grow to a further stature, so knowledge, while it is in aphorisms and observations, it is in growth; but when it once is comprehended in exact methods, it may perchance be further polished and illustrated and accommodated for use and practice, but it increaseth no more in bulk and substance.—Bacon's Advancement of Learning.

THE MOCKERY OF THANKSGIVING DAY.

Notes and Clippings.

THE French government has ordered the pope to recall his deputies to China or forfeit his amicable relations with France. The pope promises to obey.

ON the 21st, at Fairview, Ky., there was dedicated a Baptist church on the site of the building where Jefferson Davis was born June 3, 1808. Mr. Davis was present, and, entering the pulpit, pronounced the benediction.

PASTOR STAUNTON, of Brooklyn, was recently found guilty of ministerial conduct, but there are so many of his congregation who are willing to forgiv him that he has concluded not to deprive them of the moral and religious benefits of his ministrations.

FOR the first time in the career of the Rev. Sam Jones, we notice, in the Omaha Herald, that he "preached to more empty chairs than men and women in the exposition building last evening." Is the majority converted, or are Sam's sermon's growing dull?—Sun.

IT is reported that Mrs. Comstock, a medium of Norwich, Conn., is about to sue the estate of Byron Boardman, who died a year ago, for $1,000 for professional services. Mr. Boardman, she alleges, engaged her for a stated sum to attend to his spiritual cravings by the year. The $1,000 asked for represents her labors for him for three years. The administrators of the estate aver that the claim is a made-up one, and that Byron declared on his death-bed that he owed no one a dollar. Mr. Boardman's estate is valued at $50,000 or $75,000.

A PLAY called "The Acharnians," written by Aristophanes 2,300 years ago, is being performed in this city. It draws good audiences, but not much is said in favor of the play itself. The dialog of "The Acharnians" is spoken in the original Greek, the actors being some Philadelphia students. It is believed that not more than one person in 50,000 can understand it.

THE Kansas City Journal thinks that the president's pastor stands in need of correction. Immediately after Mr. Cleveland's speech at Harvard he had the effrontery to make the health of the presidential household a subject for special supplication at a service which both Mr. and Mrs. Cleveland attended. This is what the chief executiv would call one of the "crazy cracks of the cloth."

A LOT of Catholic priests of this archdiocese assembled in the cathedral one day last week and appointed the Rev. Dr. Burtsell "defender of the marriage tie." There is a young Catholic priest in Brooklyn named Sherman whose claims to this position should hav been considered by this gathering. He has recently been forced to marry one girl, and two or three others hav sued him for betrayal and abandonment. Experience should count for something in these matters.

THIS news comes from Grange City, Ky.: "Nov. 16.—The Rev. Frank Kissick, one of the best known preachers in this region, engaged in a quarrel with John Cundiff, a workman in a saw mill, and attempted to thrash him. Cundiff defended himself until he could reach a broadax lying near. He wielded the terrible weapon with both hands, and struck the preacher an awful blow, nearly cutting his body in two. Wat McKee also engaged in the fight, taking sides with Cundiff and paying special attention to William Kissick, who was defending his brother. Kissick turned on McKee, chased him through the woods, firing after him as he fled and wounding him several times. The preacher will die, and his assailant will be lucky if he escapes Judge Lynch."

THE Washington Critic tells this: A nice little boy, reared in the intellectual and heterodox atmosphere of Boston, happened to be a witness in a case in Cincinnati, and the question arose as to his being able to understand the nature of an oath, so the judge investigated him. "Well, Wendall," he said, kindly, "do you know where bad little boys will go when they die?" "No, sir," replied the boy, with confidence. "Goodness gracious!" exclaimed the judge, in shocked surprise; "don't you know they will go to hell?" "No, sir; do you?" "Of course I do." "How do you know it?" "The Bible says so." "Is it true?" "Certainly it is." "Can you prove it?" "No, not positivly; but we take it on faith," explained the judge. "Do you accept that kind of testimony in this court?" inquired the boy, coolly. But the judge didn't answer. He held up his hands and begged the lawyers to take the witness.

THE venerable Walt Whitman, author of "Leaves of Grass," is living at Camden, N. J., in a state of poverty bordering on absolute want. A correspondent of the Herald writes that he found the aged poet paralyzed, poorly clad, and rapidly decaying in body, yet cheerful and happy. Speaking of his chief work, Mr. Whitman said: "'Leaves of Grass' was published in 1855. It fell flat on the public and financially failed. Two years later a second and New York edition followed suit. The third edition of 1860 did fairly in Boston, returning a small sum. The fourth and fifth editions were dead failures, for which the war was responsible. In 1876 my centennial edition of the work and 'Two Rivulets' were issued, which I offered and sold direct from my sick room for $10 for the two volumes. These were handsomely bound and contained my photo and autograph. My luck from that time has changed for the better. I remember gratefully that Robert Buchanan championed me, aided by William M. Rossetti and Moncure D. Conway. Among the subscription lists sent over from England with $10 each for the works were the names of Tennyson, Swinburne, G. H. Lewes, Philip Bourke Marston, and others. In 1881 Osgood & Co., in Boston, brought out a new volume of 'Leaves of Grass.' In that city—the home of Freethought and liberty, Universalism, transcendentalism, etc.—the work was suppressed [by Anthony Comstock] as soon as it had successfully started."

The Decay of Christian Morality.

I.

There is more noise made over the conversion of one Liberal to the doctrins of Christianity than over the conversion of nine hundred and ninety-nine Christians to the principles of rational religion. That is about the relativ proportion of backward and forward conversions, as I should call them. Liberals are not in the habit of crowing over their successes. I hav never heard of any Liberal lecturer carrying around with him a slate and pencil to keep an account of how many men and women he impressed favorably, or how many converts he made during his lecture tour, and sending in the number to be published throughout the country in order to advertise his wares. A Liberal speaker is always rejoiced to find that people are ready to giv up their superstitions for facts, and throw away Christian dogmas for natural truths, but he is so accustomed to the experience that he does not deem it of world-wide importance to gather up the cast-off absurdities and toys and preserve them as trophies of victory.

One can almost say with certainty that out of one hundred converts to Christianity, who are made during a period of religious excitement, not more than half a dozen will be found under the delusion at the end of six months; while it is so rare that an intelligent, Freethinking man or woman ever goes back to the Christian faith that I can state that I hav no personal knowledge of a single instance. The steadfastness of the Freethinker to his convictions might pass into the saying, "Once a Liberal, always a Liberal." Backsliding seems to be one of the evidences of Christianity. The privilege of going back on one's professions is a Christian prerogativ. This is a common practice in the church, one of the exercises of new-born piety. The more times a man falls from grace the better Christian he becomes. There is no limit set to backsliding. We might imagin a certain familiar passage in the gospel of Matthew written to cover this species of pius dereliction, which would read, with a slight change in the text, after this manner: "How oft shall my brother backslide, and be received again into the church? until seven times? I say not unto thee, until seven times, but until seventy times seven." And experience has demonstrated that the ample latitude allowed the Christian believer is none too great.

The person who accepts the Christian theology is no more in sympathy with the best religion of the times than is the man who wanders about the streets begging his bread and sleeping wherever he can in harmony with the highest comforts of our civilization. There is more religion in a train of cars carrying progress and enterprise across the continent than in a conference of ministers trying to keep alive a theology that teaches that God was a Jew who lived and died in Palestine, and devising ways to make the people believe the ridiculous superstition. Truth is born where men are allowed to think and speak their thoughts. Error cannot be maintained where man is permitted to ask questions. The only way to preserve Christianity is to put it in a tin can and hav it hermetically sealed.

We are getting a new examination of the universe for a basis of our philosophy. The telescope has afforded man visions far beyond the seventh heaven of the apocalypse. The genesis of things is found to lie millions of years back of the Genesis of Moses. The chaos out of which this world was made has been found to be a previous state of existence. Science is laying the new foundation for our faith, and knowledge is building the new temple of the soul. Liberals everywhere are stating their opinions, and the world recognizes that there is to be a religious controversy on this continent that will shake to the foundation everything that is not true. Not one stone of falsehood will be left standing upon another. Every dogma of error must find a grave, and truth alone be reverenced by man.

The world has taken a step forward of Christianity, and in its march of advancement has left behind the Christian God, the Christian savior, the Christian Bible, and the Christian faith. But the world will not stop here. It must go farther. The question that the religious world is endeavoring to answer to-day is this: Is the decay of Christian theology to be followed by the decay of Christian morality? I think it is; and I also think that this morality is about as near dead now as it can be. It is true that the author of this morality is painted in divine colors for human adoration Sunday after Sunday, and his other-world ethics inculcated by the pulpit, but beyond this attempt to giv the peculiar moral teachings of Jesus the show of life there is absolutely no sign of them in the world of man.

The morality of the Christian system is not designed for humanity in its present condition, nor does it possess the elements necessary to make man into the image of any higher virtue. It is, in fact, an unnatural, unreal morality that Jesus taught, and the notion that men and women do not practice it because it is too far above them depends upon an estimation of this morality which we are not willing to allow. I do not wish to be misunderstood on this point. I want to say that the general moral duties of man, as they hav been taught for ages by teachers of every race, and every religion, are not Christian, and that Christian ethics are found in the code of moral duties taught by Jesus, which are different from the recognized standard of morality adopted by mankind generally. Christian morals are Christian only wherein they differ from all other morals. It is because they are peculiar to Christianity that they are Christian. Because I do not believe in Christianity I do not wish it said that I do not believe in morality, for I do. I believe that man can be good and true, and that he can do right, and I believe that he ought to do right.

I do not say that everyone can reach the same moral altitude I do not say that every individua can be good and true. Some persons do not seem to be morally adjusted. I think, however, that we may predicate the power of man to be moral. The notion that man cannot be good has been the apology of half the criminals of the world. It is the creed of all crime. If we affirm the idea of human depravity we may as well erase the Commandments, for if man cannot be good it is the hight of folly to command him to be so. The healthy faith of man is faith in man. The theology that has been preached for the past few centuries is not calculated to make men moral. Those ministers who hav shouted themselves hoarse for the salvation of the soul, and who hav made no account of man's behavior in their scheme to save the race, are the ones who hav rubbed religion in the dirt, and undermined the moral foundations of the world. Wherever has been preached a stiff-backed theology, there will be found a weak kneed morality. It is an admitted fact that the Christian morals are inseparable from the Christian dogmas—that they are as closely connected as the Siamese twins.

Every ethical principle that supports our social structure is independent of ecclesiastical relations. and it is not essential that we recognize any theology in order to comprehend the necessity of moral obedience. There is no sympathy between right, truth, and justice, and the apostles' creed. We may go as far as to say that the attempt to establish a union between Christianity and morality would result in an absolute divorce of these two forces. I wish to make it plain beyond a question that the Christian faith in itself is entirely distinct from all moral effect on the part of man. To believe that Jesus was the Christ does not carry any obligation to do right—does not make it incumbent upon the believer to do a single moral action. It is sufficient to establish our predication that not a single church in Christendom makes moral obedience the condition of membership.

There is a code of Christian morals which has been taught but never practiced. The special duties which Jesus enjoined upon his followers hav never been reduced to conduct. It is not too much to say that the moral precepts of Jesus, if carried into action, would cause social revolutions beyond precedent, and produce a state of existence compared with which Anarchy would be government, and confusion would be order. But before we undertake to examin the Christian morals, let us shed a few tears of rejoicing upon the grave of Christian theology. We do not care to hav a coroner's jury decide what caused the death of this theology. We bless the cause, whatever it was. We only wish to feel assured that it is really, truly dead, and the fact that "not a single treatis written by a New England Puritan is a living and authoritativ book" seems to prove it beyond a question. The persons who still preach this theology and profess to believe it are merely sitting up with the corpse.

While it is asserted that a wrong interpretation of this theology sent it out of the world, it is pretty evident that a right understanding of it inspires no wish to hav it back. Much of the superstition in morals sprung from fear of God, which Christianity inculcated as the purest and highest incentiv to right doing.

The truth, broadly and frankly stated, is this: God is no longer the inspiration of morality. Fear of God does not check the actions of man to-day, nor is the attempt to make human and divine interests identical sufficient to insure obedience to moral laws.

The ancient basis of morals is gone, and another and better one must be found to inspire, a freer life, a fuller life, a better life, and higher. We who hav rejected the Christian theology are looked upon as orphans. But if I understand the position of Freethinkers, the question of a supreme being is neither affirmed nor denied by those who wish to hav no further business with the God of orthodoxy. We read that "the fool hath said in his there is no God," but we prefer to say we know nothing about the matter.

Theologies may come and theologies may go, but humanity goes on forever, and so we do not deem it as important to worship the fleeting shadows of the universe that are cast upon the minds of men as it is to hold fast to those realities that make human existence a blessing and "a joy forever."

We are called Infidels, and denounced as having no religion because we will not march in the ranks of hypocrisy, and dance to the music of orthodoxy. We believe no statement that our reason cannot approve; we accept no doctrin that is contrary to common sense; we hav confidence in human nature; we believe in truth, justice, and love; we accept life as a blessing, and try to make it so; we believe in taking care of ourselvs, in helping others, and in being just and kind to all; and we say to the Christian church, If this be Infidelity, make the most of it.

It is suggested by some that if man's exact relation to the deity were understood, the whole question of morals would be settled at once. But would it not be truer to say that, if man's exact relation to his fellow man were understood and respected, the highest individual welfare, no less than the general good, would dictate the morality the world needs? And is not this the grand task for the human race, to rightly interpret the effect of human action upon the individual and the community, and to deduce from human experience the rules for human conduct? I do not know that I owe God any duty. I do know that I owe a duty to my neighbor. I plead total indifference to the demands of divine ethics, but I trust I am not completely callous to the wants of my fellow beings.

I owe it to myself to be moral. I owe it to my race, to every man and woman that I meet in life, to be as honest, as true, as upright, as my nature will permit. I can comprehend and appreciate obligations to humanity, but moral indebtedness to the deity I know nothing about.

The Christian morals are founded upon the assumption that the work of man here is to do something that he may escape punishment hereafter, and hence the morality of the Christian church has had little reference to the concerns of the present life.

Christian morality is based upon the Christian faith that the human race is under the curse of God, and that, to evade the penalty pronounced upon him, man must perform certain duties, these duties being taught as paramount to all we owe to self, to family, to society, and to the world. But an almost universal disbelief of the Christian faith prevails to-day, and, consequently, a new morality, with man for its supreme object, is fast supplanting the cutworn and valueless performance of Christian duties.

The moral teaching of the New Testament may be the highest and purest of its kind of teaching, but it is not the kind that is needed to-day. It is a false morality, yea, a dead morality for the most part, that the Christian church demands of men. The general conviction is that no salvation is needed by man, and that all the virtues advertised as requisit for such safety as the church is prepared to secure are spurious virtues. Those actions that advance man along the way of general prosperity, that make it easier to liv and get a living on the earth, that hav their value determined by their respect for human beings, are what the world needs.

The generally-acknowledged author of Christian morals offers no salient points for criticism, as he cannot be regarded as a historical person whose career has been carefully followed and marked by the biographer. He is a mythological man, with a little less of the fabulous and a little more of the real than attaches to the gods and goddesses of ancient Greece and Rome. The name of Jesus adorns an anatomy of words. It pictures a person, not of flesh and blood, but of faith and fancy. Jesus is a man of the imagination, but, mythical as he is, certain men and women believe in him in their own way, and are not intolerant of those who are disposed to ask for the proofs of his life and works. This man has left no more marks of his living upon the earth than hav the birds the marks of their flight through the air. The New Testament is no more history than is Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." We cannot make any positiv assertions in regard to the life and character of a man when we do not know who was his father, where or when he was born, with whom he lived, nor when he died. The only historical fact connected with Jesus that is not disputed is that Mary was his mother. This is a very important point in his history, but it is not sufficient to constitute a biography.

Notwithstanding the fact that the entire narrativ of Jesus is without a single chronological date, and the vastly more significant fact that not a single incident connected with the person of Jesus is sustained by contemporaneous history, we must perforce speak of him as a person whose whole career was watched and noted from his miraculous advent to his miraculous ascension, and look upon his disciples as so many Boswells, ready to mirror to the world his every speech and act.

We must do this—why? Because the world will not candidly and critically study the gospel story. For the present, then, we will speak of Jesus as a man, and accept him as the author of the moral code in the New Testament. But a word or two about the man. The Christian world sets him apart as the model of the race, as the masterpiece of nature as the utmost that earth can produce.

Every man must here fetch his word of praise, and every word be a mountain, to meet the demand of the Christian church for reverence of Jesus.

I do not believe in the infallibility of any man, but I believe in the improvability of all men. Is man no longer heir to the virtues of life, that he must erect monuments of praise forever over the name of Jesus?

I shall take the liberty to express my dissent from the common expressions of admiration for this man. I cannot praise everything he did, nor think every word he uttered a star of wisdom.

He said some good things, but much that he said is good for nothing. His theology will do for Sunday-schools, but it will not stand half a dozen questions by common sense. His hell was barbarous, his heaven childish, and his ideas of humanity show but a superficial knowledge of human nature.

His life cannot be imitated with advantage to the race, and his notions of human existence are wholly inadequate to the complex, varied civilization of this age.

Let us see what he did: He paid no filial respect to his reputed parents; he refused to acknowledge his mother and his brothers; he lived a roving, wandering life; he paid no heed to the laws of his country; he placed no value upon industry, and even went so far as to tell men and women that God would feed and clothe them; he helped himself to the property and possessions of other people without paying for them, and destroyed what belonged to others without offering an equivalent; he had no property, no home, not a place to lay his head; he hated the rulers, yet sought to establish a kingdom for himself; he failed to reach the throne he sought, and died upon the malefactor's cross. Is this the man for the nineteenth century to honor? Is this the man for men to follow in this age? Is this the man whose life all should strive to imitate?

(TO BE CONCLUDED.)

A Letter from Lucy Colman.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: When I saw you at the Convention at White Sulphur Springs, I think I told you that I would soon send you a letter which should contain some reminiscences of a life, fifty years of which hav been given to work in the field of reform. I hav not yet found time even to begin such a letter, because from that time to the present I hav been upon the wing, and even now I am not at home; but I want to say to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, among whom I number my dearest friends, that I hav renewed my age so far that I hav come to feel that my work for the world is not quite done. I propose in the present year to put upon paper very many of the events of my life which connect me with all the social reforms of the age in which I liv, "Antislavery" and "Woman's Rights" leading the list; and if the good editor of our paper will permit, I will, from time to time, send you, through the paper, some specimens of what I hope to put into book form, which shall be for the encouragement of young Freethinkers, for I can assure them that work for humanity always pays largely in the end. We are so constituted that we grow through suffering. We "climb the ladder round by round;" the effort we make to rise to the first givs us strength for the next lift, or, to change the metaphor, having found that persecution for the truth's sake can be endured, we find at last that there is real enjoyment in suffering which lifts humanity to a higher plane.

I hope to be well settled at home before the close of the year. I am now with that most charming family at Boonton whom you know through Mr. Reynolds, and of whom I shall hav much to say in the future. I hav only time at present to say, two more families of this kind would redeem New Jersey and make her a decent state. I am not at all sure that this one is not equal to it.

I am so much indebted to my friend, Daniel Edward Ryan, and his good wife, for making it possible, and even easy, for me to be present at the Annual Congress just closed, that, like Dickens's character in "Bleak House," I want to write his name large, that all may read it—a man always on the right side. No wonder Henry George and the new party achieved such a success, with such men as Mr. Ryan as working members.

Through Mr. Ryan I made the acquaintance of Mrs. Lucy Parsons, the wife of one of the condemned Anarchists. She is a splendid woman, a mulatto; only think of it—one of a race who, a few years ago, were held in such absolute bondage by government that some of us jeoparded our lives by saying, "Down with the government!" How many of us were imprisoned—ah! how many lost their lives—in that sacred cause is not to-day known. Shall such a woman be made a widow, and her children orphans, because Mr. Parsons dared to speak his honest thought? Can it be possible that such men are to be hung by the neck until they are dead? Who among us will not agree with Colonel Ingersoll that we are yet uncivilized? The march of the souls of seven murdered men, murdered by law, shall sound an alarm that shall awake to thought and to action an army to demand that murder by law shall be abolished.

Boonton, N. J., Nov. 17th. LUCY N. COLMAN.

Post-mortem Probations and Infantil Damnations.

Having given an impartial hearing to our Christian controversialists about infant damnation, will they graciously allow us to recall Mrs. Glasse's advice in her receipt-book for cooking a hare of, "First catch your hare."

For what proof or probability is there of the existence of the dead children more or less damnable?

I am no stubborn Materialist, denying a world of life to me invisible. I am candidly ignorant whether soul is a function of the nervous system, or the body but the outward form of soul, or whether there may not be two or more bodies, the visible and the potential, fitting one within the other.

Admitting man or some men to be or to hav souls more or less immortal, upon what is the existence of such soul predicated? On intelligence and sentiment, spiritual passions and faculties, I suppose. The preëxistence of souls to bodies, taught by Wordsworth in his celebrated poem, has been quite a prevalent doctrin among the immortalists, and obviates the difficulty of developing souls out of human bodies, while not allowing them to other animals which evince, however, in their conduct much intelligence and sentiment. Wordsworth must indeed by his "White Doe of Rylstone" be credited with the belief in grades of soul other than human. But previous to a certain, not well defined, epoch in development, inasmuch as no evidences of intelligence or sentiment exist, we are not warranted in supposing that the hypothecated soul has entered its organic tenement. Where there is nothing, there the king loses his rights, and the devil his privileges.

What necessity or feasibility, not to say possibility, is there for the spiritual development of non-viable fœtuses which in our species correspond to the myriads of kittens, puppies, fish eggs, dropping fruits, etc.? Nature's tribute to waste? This seems to be an effect of the modern evolutionary craze. It is no Bible faith doctrin, and whatever evidence may be adduced in its favor must be, I suppose, of the cheap mediumistic sort that would not be admitted in any court of justice.

Development of faculty and character beyond or in a different direction from ordinary growth up to a certain age is an exceptional, not a general fact, whether for races or for individuals. An illusion is created by certain inventions which only the past rendered possible. Elizabeth Barrett struck true in writing:

> When we drive out with our clouds of steam majestical white horses,
> Are we greater than the first ones who led black ones by the mane?

If the faculty of invention takes hold upon creation and associates its author with nature's primal forces, it is a sinister fact that the dignities of personality hav fallen, not risen, in the use of those inventions which distinguish the operativ of to-day from the artisan of yesterday. The former is less a man, less than the great machine to which he is an appendage, and to which the inventor's genius has enslaved him. Analyzing the basis of the idea of immortality, we find among faiths the Hebrew, which predicated it not of individuals, but of organic types in family or race, and the Christian, which predicated it on the affirmed resurrection of Jesus, about which there is no evidence capable of establishing any fact, so that it is simply a bit of clerical stage property, on a par with paste diamonds and tinseled robes. Admitted as a miracle, it would be good for Jesus, but not for anybody else without further proof.

But survival of death is not merely an article of faith; it is demonstrable, not precisely of individuals, but of the ideas which they represent, either in organism or social uses. The organic idea persistent is manifested in successiv generations of a common type. Social ideas, or the uses of character, are what we generally refer to in saying that a man, a Walter Scott, a Goethe, a Napoleon, or a Washington, has achieved immortality.

But the infants who hav furnished no career in this life hav neither of these claims to another. Their organic type has rejected them as inadequate to its purposes, and they hav not become the coefficients of any social purpose. Even the parental pride or affection that claims their survival is unconscious whether or not that claim is honored. It is not apparent that there is really any other than a clerical interest to be served by the cultivation of such ideas.

In remarking the survival of ideas, I neither affirm nor deny that of individual personalities associated with them. There is simply a suggestion, the verification of which awaits post-mortem experience, or, at least, successful experiments in ghost-craft, of which I am ignorant.

It is the consciousness of a personality that we are reluctant to part with which chiefly constitutes the aspiration to immortality, though few of us cherish the memories of our personal experience. This conscious personality is nowhere more conspicuous than in the behavior of individual roosters and hens, which, however, hav not been especially regarded as candidates for immortality. How about their eggs? Will they survive our gastric satisfaction for the development of spiritual chickens?

We may distinguish the cases in which undeveloped beings perish by inadequacy or non-viability, and those of violence, or infanticide, irrespectiv of gastronomy. But then only the viable children that get killed can be qualified by the vigor of their organic essence, either as candidates for Christian training or for the "alternativ" destinies which Dr. Withrow protests against.

If the organic type invariably represent itself in strongly self-conscious personalities, as all roosters and many other bipeds, either feathered or feather less, attest, then we need not be concerned about this integrant factor of immortality, and may indulge infinit prospectivs of chicken fixings, doubtless implying wheat bread, whose spiritual character will make it light and easily-digested, even without Horsford's phosphates, or "royal baking powder, absolutely pure." I.

MR. B. F. CLARK, Dear Sir: Yes, my time is, indeed, very much occupied, but nevertheless I hav read your letter with pleasure, and shall respond, as you see, promptly. I can hardly claim to be a "leading light," as you say, in Freethought, and I suspect that you overestimate the desire felt to know my opinion upon the subject named, but I am never afraid to "'fess right up" to such opinions as I do possess, and I am not ashamed to say that I do not know a great many things.

Therefore, when I shall hav expressed myself to you upon the various "isms" which you hav asked me to discuss in a public letter, lecture, pamphlet, or book, the high opinion which you are pleased to say that you hav formed of me, and of my abilities, may materially change.

For it is only too true that few people yet liv (even though they be Freethinkers or Liberals) who can retain a marked difference of opinion, and, at the same time, mutual respect and esteem.

Therefore, the degree of interest which you and your friends, as you assure me, hav been pleased to take in my opinions may undergo diminution when I say that I do not consider myself sufficiently well-informed upon the various "isms" named to undertake to enlighten other people. I hav never yet undertaken to write a lecture or an article upon any subject to which I had not given long, serious, and consecutiv thought.

Now, of course, I hav done the usual general reading of newspapers, magazines, and a few books. I hav listened to or participated in occasional conversations, and heard a limited number of so-called debates upon these "isms." But I hav at no time given such consecutiv thought, nor such close study to any of them as to now feel myself capable of properly discussing them in public.

So much that is weak, shallow, and (as it seems to me) wholly wide of the mark already afflicts the public upon these topics, each one of which must hav some germ of truth somewhere, however distorted or ill-presented or overworked it may be, that I do not wish to add to the vast swarm of incompetents who vainly try to handle political economy from an outlook limited to a few pitiful facts gleaned from an experience or study covering a few years, a single country, or a given petty premise.

Therefore, I can only say to you that I am yet only a student, and not a teacher, of any of the phases of radical reform or governmental change of which you ask me.

Of course, I hav certain opinions, "views," or perhaps more fairly stated, I should say prejudices, in favor of or against these theories; but I am quite willing to admit that I do not know enough about their real meaning to assume to instruct others. I am quite willing, and am pleased when I can do so, to listen to capable people talk upon either side.

I do not believe that I can hav heard or read, as yet, the best that can be said for any one of them. I say this because I cannot conceive of what I hav heard or read being sufficiently conclusiv or convincing to accomplish some of the results already attained.

Now, as to "free love." We must all admit that love, to be love at all, must be "free" to choose its object.

But, of the vast amount of rubbish and immorality that has been attached to that one central idea, I hav only this to say:

I do not believe in any form of polygamy which has yet been tried, whether it be simultaneous, successiv, termal, incidental, or "for life;" and I can conceive of none that would or could enlist my admiration.

Personally, I believe in but one marital love in one life; but I am well aware that some very good people differ from me wholly upon this point.

As to the promiscuity usually called "free love," it seems an utter abomination to me. Certainly, if there are, as you think, a sufficiently large number of people who care to read this letter, to justify the editor in so doing, I shall hav no objections to its publication in one of the Freethought papers. I am sorry that I am not sufficiently well informed upon these questions to be of service to others. But I am not, and I never attempt to swim until I hav pretty thoroughly tested the depth of the water. Meantime I hav no doubt that you can get very decided opinions from a thousand Freethinkers, if you ask for them.

Very sincerely, HELEN H. GARDENER.

II.

MR. B. F. CLARK, Dear Sir: I hav read, with interest, the inclosed letter. I hav no corrections to make, and no suggestions, of course.

I see no objection to your publishing the letter just as it is, if you so desire.

I really cannot conduct a debate upon the subjects, however, and I did write "frankly and honestly" when I said that I do not believe that I fully understand the real germs of the various "isms" named.

And, if you will pardon me for so saying, I also believe that by far the larger number of those who talk about them know even less than I of their meaning.

This, as you must know, is true in regard to "Freethought" also. A vast number of its "advocates" confuse it hopelessly with "license," and act accordingly.

And as for its opponents, you must be fully aware that they wholly misunderstand, not only its meaning, but its object and aims as well.

This fact alone warns me never to feel sure that I fully comprehend any new move which is (or seems to be) wholly subversiv of the old order of things simply because my "instinctiv and natural" inclination or prejudice may lead that way. That is the old church argument, and it is the one which fully satisfies and holds most of her adherents back from any thought or study of the real meaning of the movement in which the words "Infidel," "Freethinker," "Atheist," etc., etc., hav stood to them for all that is wicked, vile, and dangerous.

Many very good people are Socialists, and I do not, therefore, believe that they can understand this matter as you do. Who is right? Either or both? How shall we know until we inform ourselvs fully, not as to the froth that is talked about it, but as to its real meaning and intent? As I said before, this is my present position; yet, I do not expect to be "lost," and I rather doubt ever becoming a "Socialist." Still, I am willing to think and anxious to learn. Hastily, H. H. G.

An Orthodox Fraud.

We hav been deceived, most egregiously imposed upon, and taken captiv by what the civilized world calls Christianity, ever since its history or its literature has been written, or what is called its cardinal tenets hav been believed by professed Christians. This statement I shall substantiate by the testimony and admissions of the highest authority known to English-speaking Christendom. That authority is the revelations and confessions of the Old and New Testaments companies of England and America lately engaged in revising the Bible; and as may be found in the "Companion to the Revised New Testament," and the "Companion to the Revised Old Testament." Both of these were prepared and published with the consent, approbation, and assistance of the respectiv companies; the former by a member of the English company, Alexander Roberts, D.D., and the latter by the Rev. Talbot W. Chambers, D.D., of the American Company, in New York city; both by Funk & Wagnalls, 10 and 12 Dey street, New York, American publishers.

The careful readers of these "Companions" will find an ample amount of this testimony in the admissions and confessions throughout these volumes, with the ordinary religious cant, pious platitudes, and solemn verbiage to decoy the reader and blind him to the facts and startling Infidel revelations they hav so often covertly made.

They tell us they were engaged some fifteen years in attempting to revise the Bible, and admit the arduous difficulties and obstructions they had to encounter, and the utter impossibility they found of arriving at what the original writers wrote or meant to convey. They only confess to improving the text, and making some approximation toward the original, or rather toward what they found in older Greek manuscripts and in some copies of the text in other languages, of the one hundred and fifty thousand different readings which they acknowledged were admitted to be now in existence. The revision was undertaken under a pledge or promis not to disturb the context nor doctrinal teachings, but simply to improve the grammar and taste to meet the demands of modern culture.

Among the admissions of errors they found in our English Bible are these, that the names of God, Christ, Lord, Savior, Belial, etc., never should hav been in the Bible. They were not names and did not represent personalities, but were simply words in the Greek text of which they purport to be a translation. But the Christian world, through the superstition and idolatry of our heathen-European ancestors, had been imposed upon and long deceived by this fraud in our translation; and having become attached to it, nothing but that superstitious reverence kept it there, and they dare not attempt to make such a serious change, for it would defeat their labors, of course, and consign their own good names to infamy. To hav done so would hav been a godless, wicked heresy.

Let us fancy what our religion would be without these names, or the personalities which they purport to represent. We know that without them we would not hav the material and we could not build up Christianity. Why, there is nothing to build it with! There are no persons or spirits or supernatural entities to manage or run it on earth or in heaven without these personalities at the helm. So that the whole system falls to the ground as a stupendous fraud. This is known and not disguised by standard orthodoxy itself in the secrets now disclosed by the reverend savants and sages who hav been worshiping at its shrine for fifteen years, professing to be trying to save what they hav, unwittingly, virtually destroyed.

They say the Hebrew Jehovah or Javah, or some other word, should hav been retained in the place of our Teutonic God or Gott. It meant with the intelligent ancient Jewish prophets and writers "the incommunicable," the inconceivable, the eternal, the unchangeable, in the same sense that modern scientists and philosophers use the unknowable, infinit energy, final cause, indestructible forces, etc. These terms are used when we come to the end of our knowledge and investigations, simply to express our ignorance of all beyond. Now, how can we make a confession of our ignorance into a personality and then proceed to endow that personality with all the human and other attributes imagination and fancy can invent as a basis for our religion?

Yet this is what the revisers tacitly admit we must do in order to retain our faith and enjoy the blessings, the hopes of salvation which our Christianity thus founded, constructed, and maintained promises to all those who humbly and meekly accept it.

Then they tell us that "Christ," and "Belial," "Lord," and "Savior," are not names, but are forgeries of copyists and our translators to represent their own and the prevailing superstitions, translated from simple Greek words which represented abstract principles, virtues, vices, or forces; for instance, Christ represents wisdom and virtue, and was used in connection with the name Jesus, or Joshua, in the Hebrew, because it was the qualifying adjectiv to designate his character. It was afterward conferred on him as a title. Thus we see in the course of time a mere adjectiv became a God, a son of God, a Lord, a Savior. Pagan superstition and mythology did this. They hav been equal to anything in the line of fraud, and the people hav been equal to accepting anything they could offer. To-day the survivors of those revising committees, and every intelligent clergyman or layman in the land, knows, or can know and ought to know, the fabulous foundation, the shadowy, mythical basis, and the visionary, fraudulent origin of our whole system of religion called Christianity. The clergy cannot deny this. But what of it? they say; if it is all fabulous, it has been the means of saving souls, of producing much happiness, of redeeming sinners, and blessing the world! Science and the growth of thought hav done all this.

The education and intelligence of the people made it a necessity to attempt a revision of the Bible, to save its character, so the the revisers tell us. Their object was not so much to giv us the truth as they might honestly find it as it was to save the oracle, the charter of our religion and the bulwark of their profession, and to prevent their own reputations going into decay and disrepute before the growing intelligence.

These motivs for the undertaking were obvious; but there was too much natural honesty, or not enough adroitness, in their methods and confessions to conceal the facts and truths which they did not mean to openly avow to the public.

They could not deny them, and in order to show us how thorough their remedies had been, and to inspire public confidence in the result of their labors, they covertly revealed what cannot fail to be the death of that which they hav attempted to save.

There has nothing ever come from the church of the same authority so damaging to Christianity, and to the support of Infidelity, so-called, as this testimony from the revising companies contained in the "Companions."

Of course, it is meant to be concealed or disguised to the uncritical reader, in the pious verbiage, fulsome plaudits, and reverent homage with which the volumes abound. There is no weapon the Freethinker can use more effectivlly against the authority, the authenticity, or what is called the divine origin of the Christian religion, than that which its own friends and advocates furnish us in these "Companions." The revisers are their own witnesses against themselvs, their own faith, and the utter unreliability of that book on which the whole superstructure depends. Why shall we go to Infidel authors, who are so generally repudiated, for our facts, reasonings, and testimony, when we hav at hand the recognized, undisputed, and high testimony of the church itself, or its best and ablest representativs, in these one hundred or more savants who constituted these revising companies and furnished to us in these "Companions?"

We know the plea for all this fraud is that "the end justifies the means," that "we may do evil that good may come," that it is better to save sinners than to be honest.

Church and religious history abounds in these precepts and this policy.

Yet nowhere else, nor for any other purpose, is this advocated or permitted but in our religion. We may practice fraud toward God and our own souls, but not in our secular affairs toward one another, without violating law, outraging morals, and losing character. We call our religion divine, and because it is such, it is exempt from the canons of human criticism or secular obligations. Oh, great is the mystery of godliness! great are the means of salvation! and who will be saved? T. E. LONGSHORE.

Philadelphia, Nov., 1886.

The Liberal Club.

There is no use discussing the question, because there is but one side to it: the Manhattan Liberal Club furnishes the best entertainment, from an all-round point of view—if the reader will kindly conceive that such a point of view is possible—afforded by any institution in the great metropolitan city of New York. The man with a badge-pin has lived in Gotham long enough to hav obtained a pretty comprehensiv notion of its list of things calculated to attract the public eye. He has seen the statue of Liberty enlightening the world, and the statue of William E. Dodge dodging the customs. He has been to the Catholic cathedral and to the Eden Musée. He has attended the churches of all denominations except the Presbyterian—the line had to be drawn somewhere. He was at Cooper Union when the County Democracy nominated Abram Hewitt for a savior of society. He went to Jerry McAuley's Cremorne Mission before Jerry died, and to Peter Dwyer's revival before Peter ran away with the organist. He has drifted into almost every place of gathering on Manhattan Island, but he never knew what it was to feel like heaving to and dropping anchor until he attended a regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club.

The 421st meeting of this body was held on the evening of Friday, the 19th, President Wakeman being in the chair on the platform, and a large and finely-dressed audience occupying all the other chairs in the hall. The lecturer of the occasion was Mr. John W. Lovell, publisher of Lovell's Library. The audience greeted the speaker warmly. Mr. Lovell waived the formality of addressing the Chair, and plunged into the reading of his lecture with a speed of three hundred words per minute. The Credit Foncier of Sinaloa on Topolobampo bay was the subject. It appears that Mr. A. K. Owen has secured from the government of Mexico a grant of a large tract of land in the state of Sinaloa, Mexico, where it is designed to start a coöperativ colony, centering at Topolobampo bay, just across the gulf from the southern extremity of Lower California. As yet the colony exists only on paper and in the minds of its projectors. A book by Mr. Owen, entitled "Integral Coöperation," contains charts and diagrams of this ideal city, and the Credit Foncier, a little paper published at Hammonton, N. J., is the organ of the enterprise. Mr. Lovell's lecture was chiefly from Mr. Owen's book. It comprised a biography of Mr. Owen, a history of the scheme up to the present time, and a statement of the advantages of the country and the system of coöperation to be adopted. All the elements of disorder afflicting our present defectiv system—including lawyers, ministers, churches, boarding houses, and other evils—are to be abolished by the Credit Foncier of Sinaloa on Topolobampo bay.

At the conclusion of the lecture Mr. Lovell was interrogated by the audience touching various things connected with the enterprise. It appears that the country is without water, wood, or coal. Water must be bored for or brought thirty miles, involving the laying of an aqueduct; coal is one hundred miles away, and no railroad to it; wood is hundreds of miles distant inland, or it can be shipped to Topolobampo from San Francisco. On the other hand, the soil is extremely fertil; one crop a year—that is, during the wet season—is assured, and with irrigation four crops may be raised.

Colonel Hinton was the first to take the platform. The Credit Foncier, he said, was a beautiful dream. He knew Colonel Owen well as a man who had tried to make capital in the ordinary worldly way, and had failed before the Topolobampo benevolent scheme was thought of. Colonel Hinton had been to Topolobampo and to Guaymas. The climate was excessivly hot, and the land so dry as not to be available for agriculture without irrigation. The cost of bringing the water would exhaust the capital of the company. The place had no resources—no back country. The shipping of timber from San Francisco was out of the question, and buildings must be made of adobe; that is to say, mud. People going there must expect to face all the troubles of pioneer life, with the added disadvantage of a foreign country and climate. He doubted if the colony could exist six months without coming in collision with the tyrannical Mexican government. Colonel Hinton believed the Credit Foncier of Sinaloa on Topolobampo bay to be purely impracticable.

Dr. Gunn said that the greatest objection to this Credit Foncier of Sinaloa on Topolobampo bay was that it contemplated a gigantic steal from the people of Mexico. As far as he could see, the company was a corporation seeking its own interests.

Dr. Weeks told the story of the man who won the wager that sovereigns could not be sold for a shilling apiece on London bridge. The world was suspicious of those who offer too much for a little, and that was the reason the people rejected the Credit Foncier of Sinaloa on Topolobampo bay. Dr. Weeks was inclined to think that the land theories of Henry George were more practicable, because there was a better prospect of their being realized.

Judge Rice took the platform by invitation. He was a believer in the Credit Foncier of Sinaloa on Topolobampo bay, though he did not ask anybody to go there, and did not propose to go himself. There was the disadvantage that the colonists would be in subjection to the government of Mexico, but it was the best place on earth for coöperation, and it needed only capital to make Sinaloa the greatest country in the world. The people there are anxious to hav their country developed. The government is in theory a republic, and in fact a despotism, but it is as safe a place as the United States. The great obstacle in the way of coöperation was the fact that human nature needed reforming, because now it is impossible for people to be on an equality and be happy. This speaker answered all the objections raised by the critics.

Mrs. Leonard suggested that the Credit Foncier of Sinaloa on Topolobampo bay should exist somewhere except on paper, and that before people are asked to go to Mexico something should be provided for them to sit down on and rest when they get there. Once there, the colonist must remain, because no way is afforded of getting home again. There is no railroad, and the walking is bad. Mrs. Leonard had had some experience in pioneer life, and was not charmed with it. It had many discomforts and a dearth of luxuries. The people who embarked in these enterprises were usually those who were not a success at home.

Mr. Lovell, in closing the discussion, said that the bringing of wood from San Francisco to Mexico was not impossible. The people of England got their timber from Canada. Besides, there was a growth of mesquite-trees on the land granted by the government of Mexico to the Credit Foncier of Sinaloa on Topolobambo bay. A large colored map was displayed, showing the advantageous location of the proposed colony. Topolobampo was not as hot as Guaymas, nor as unhealthy, and had a better harbor. Dr. Gunn's charge that the corporation intended to steal the land from the people of Mexico was not literally true, though the enterprise would not allow itself to be too seriously retarded on account of some possible Indian who might be disturbed. These things and others were rehearsed, and then the colored map was furled, at which the audience dispersed and went out in the wide, wide world; and as the badge-pin man came forth he heard the echoes say, "The Credit Foncier of Sinaloa on Topolobampo bay."

At the next meeting the venerable subject of "Alcohol in the Human System" will be discussed by several doctors.

THE signs of material progress in Syria are recounted by the Spectator in conventional phrases with fantastic effect. The streets of the New Jerusalem are well lighted with oil lamps, and there are great clocks displayed in the public buildings. The number of dwellings has trebled during twenty-five years. Church bells are rung on Sundays, and schools are open five days in the week. Women are interested in Paris fashions and copy them. Suburbs are building up rapidly, and enterprising citizens, doubtless, are projecting street railways and Queen Anne cottages. The New Jerusalem is a comparativly clean and sweet-smelling town. No public nuisances such as tanneries and slaughter houses are tolerated. The sanitary engineer has arisen to tell dreadful tales about sewer-gas and bad plumbing. And so it goes throughout Syria. Bethlehem rebuilt has paved roads and a street-cleaning brigade. Nazareth is given over to oil speculators, five hundred thousand olive-trees being planted every year in the surrounding district. At the foot of Mount Carmel, and in Joppa, there is intense activity in real estate. Ancient Shechem, where Joseph was sold, has become the joint inheritance of shoemakers and soap-fat men.

To the Liberals of America.

The secretary of the American Secular Union will begin his annual lecture trip from January 1, 1887, to be continued throughout the year. The method of work thus far pursued has been unanimously indorsed by the Congress. There hav been some honest differences of opinion in regard to the best way of advancing the interests of Freethought. It has been decided that the main means to reach the minds of all the people is by pioneer lecturing and organizing, while in conjunction with these there should be distribution of Freethought literature, the sale of books, and the increased circulation of Freethought journals. On this basis the work of the Union will be pushed more vigorously than ever. The aid and generosity of Robert G. Ingersoll hav carried us through two years of successful labor, and the gratitude of all Liberals is due to his magnanimous coöperation. Much has been learned. Experience is the wisest teacher. It is through unceasing endeavor that the best results are attained. The promis of the future is great. Only, however, by hard work, patience, and each one doing what he can for the general cause can national coöperation be maintained. There must be a commonwealth of Liberalism throughout America, and this is to be achieved by the efforts of the Union. This is the representativ organization. It is through this that the Nine Demands will become a political influence, and complete justice and liberty be acquired.

The secretary will devote himself mainly for the coming year to the Western field—to Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, Idaho, Montana, California, Nevada, Oregon, and Washington territory. He desires to enter into communication with all Liberals who wish for lectures in their vicinity in order to arrange for constant work at the least expense. The board of directors will outline plans more fully in next week's paper. The situation must be studied in order that the most effectiv measures may be adopted, and the utmost possible benefit achieved with the greatest economy of resources. If all those who are interested in the American republic, in the total separation of church and state, will simply join heart and hand in this movement for public agitation and progress, that which has been done will be made of priceless value. The masses of Liberals must carry forward the enterprise hereafter. This year will test the strength of our cause—whether it springs from deep conviction, or is simply a floating sentiment, a side issue in the mighty march of human affairs. Do the Liberals of this country stand for the highest, the most progressiv, the most noble, truths and deeds of the time, and are they ready for a common effort in this direction to be a vital force in humanity; or are they simply epicureans of thought and feeling, daintily serving themselvs, with no worldwide interest? Liberalism, in what it tears down and in what it builds up, is indeed the sublimest effort of humanity, and without doubt there are thousands in our land who will respond to its glorious call.

Having achieved much, let still more be achieved in the fraternity of our sublime ideas.

The secretary of the Union is ready for work. It is for the Liberals of the country to afford the opportunity whereby through united labor the power and glory of freedom may be established in our political institutions.

Address all communications hereafter to Guesses at Truth.

WHEN Moses, the alleged author of the first portion of the Bible, appears in history, China, and Egypt, and Babylon, and Phœnicia, and Syria had already enjoyed a highly advanced civilization of more than one thousand years' standing, with a sacred literature, and with good moral precepts to guide the people.

THE Bible is not an inspired volume, nor a revealed book, nay, it is not even an original book; its opening narrativs are the narrativs of other and older Bibles, its miracles are the miracles wrought among other and older people, its ceremonies and institutions are those of older faiths, its truths had been promulgated and practiced one thousand years before Abraham or Moses were ushered upon the scenes of history.

To the many the form "sacred volume" means: The volume given by the hands of God; and "revelation" means: That every word of it, from its opening to its closing page, is revealed—that parts of it were written by man under the immediate dictation by the mouth of God in audible words; other parts were revealed by outward visible signs, by the Urim and Thummim, by dreams and visions; other parts, again, were written under the unerring guidance of the divine spirit; other parts, the decalog, for instance, were written by the finger of God; that the prophets did not speak any words of their own; that they were only the instruments of God, who inspired them and spoke through them; that not merely the thoughts and words of scripture, but even the vowel points, were of divine origin; that in it all that man is ever to know is made known, and all that is not made known is never to be known; that all it teaches was never known before, nor was any of its truths ever revealed to any people, save the people of Israel; that there is nothing false in it, no corruptions of text, no anachronisms, no conflicts—the world was created in six times twenty-four hours, and a luxuriant vegetation sprang up before a sun was yet created; man was formed out of a lump of clay and woman out of a man's rib; the serpent did speak, and so did Balaam's ass; the different languages did originate, all at once, at the tower of Babel; Joshua did arrest the sun in his course; the waters did separate and stood like two walls till about one million of people had passed through the gap on dry land; fire and lions and whale refused to consume Daniel and his three friends and Jonah, and Elijah ascended alive and unscathed to heaven in a fiery chariot. Such belief is childish.

Providence in Methodism.

From the Denison Gazetteer.

Bishop Galloway, in an eloquent sermon Saturday night, on the providence of God in Methodism, said God commenced three generations back to produce a John Wesley; but he neglected to inform his hearers whether he attributed John Wesley's denunciation of the American patriots of the Revolution as traitors, deserving of condign punishment at the hands of the tyrannical sovereign of Great Britain, to an "overruling providence" or the instigation of the devil.

John Wesley was a pronounced Tory, and wrote and preached against the great leaders in the cause of American independence.

"The supposition that the people are the origin of power is every way indefensible," he said, speaking of the origin of power.

"If your ancestors were subjects, they acknowledged a sovereign; if they had a right to English privileges, they were accountable to English laws, and had ceded to king and Parliament the power of disposing, without their consent, of both their lives, liberties, and properties" (Wesley's Address to the American Colonies).

"Brethren, open your eyes! Be no longer the dupes of designing men. Be warned in time. . . . Let us put away our sins, the real ground of all our calamities, which never will or can be thoroughly removed, till we fear God and honor the king" (Ibid).

One great complaint on the part of the colonists, and which is set forth in such strong language in the immortal Declaration, was unjust taxation; but Wesley said: "The supreme power in England has a legal right of levying any tax upon them [the colonists] for any end beneficial to the whole empire."

If Wesley could hav had his way, the necks of the people of the colonies would hav remained under the heel of England's crafty king. John Wesley was no friend to the cause of American independence. He was so extremely loyal to home government that he adhered to the church of England. The Methodist Episcopal church of to-day is not the church of John Wesley.

A Screw Loose Somewhere.

DEACON HOLYBOY'S REMARKS AT THE PRAYER-MEETING.

"The thought suggested to me this evening by our pastor's remarks—and it is one which very often forms the subject of my meditations—is that we are too often, far too often, inconsiderate of the feelings of others. We are told that we should consider the frailties and foibles of the aged, and this duty is impressed upon all of us; but are we not often thoughtless and unsympathetic in our intercourse with the young, with those dependent upon us, and whose future lives we are unconsciously molding by our words and our example? Above all, brethren, speak gently to the young. Strive to lead them by the silken cords of love, rather than by the galling chains of—er—er—slavery." (Murmurs of "Isn't that beautiful!") "Speak kindly to those who are dependent upon you; if you hav occasion to reprove them, do it quietly and affectionately, and in words that will soothe rather than irritate, and which may sink deep into their hearts and bring forth abundant fruit. By a word carelessly spoken we may influence for good or evil the whole life of another being. Think, then, how heavy is our responsibility, how careful we should be in our intercourse with all about us, especially with the young and impressionable. And by our actions as well as our words should we strive to influence those who look to us for guidance. We should liv upright and stainless lives; we should choose for our associates only the pure and noble. Let us do all this, and in the end it shall be said of us," etc.

DEACON HOLYBOY'S REMARKS AT HIS OFFICE THE NEXT MORNING.

"Morning, Johnson! Where's that boy? Not here yet? Why, it's nine o'clock! I'll pitch the young whelp out of the window when he gets here. Ah, here he is! Now then, boy, what hav you got to say for yourself? Grandmother sick? What in thunder is your grandmother to me? Now look here, you cub, don't you imagin that I take any stock in that yarn. Johnson, dock him twenty-five cents; if he tries it again I'll discharge him. No, we don't want any matches, and if you show your face in here again I'll kick you out. Ah, Mr. Slocum, how are you? When did you come down from Windy Hollow? Well, you came at the right time, for prices are 'way down, and we'll expect to sell you a nice little bill of goods. But let's go out and hav a little something together for old acquaintance sake. And, by the by, I've got a couple of tickets for the theater to-night, and you must go with me. Burlesque show—lots of pretty women, and all that sort of thing. Ha! ha! ha! After the performance I'll show you round a little. But come on! Johnson, if anyone calls while I'm out tell them I'll be back in half an hour. And Johnson, if the Rev. Mr. Litewate calls, say you don't know when I'll be in, but that I'll see him at the conference-meeting to-night if I am not detained too late at the office."—Tid-Bits.

Can Theism be Maintained by Science and Reason?

The doctrin of a God is just in this position, that heretofore it has been accepted upon authority—upon the same authority as that upon which the most preposterous fables hav been given out as solid truth. That authority is discredited, and among the intelligent classes is becoming more so from day to day. It has now to maintain itself in the open field of philosophy.—W. D. LeSeur, B. A., in September Popular Science Monthly.

This being the true state of affairs in the theological world to-day, the paramount question to be settled, and embracing a liquidation of all minor and associate topics, is the one proposed by the learned writer quoted and now respectfully submitted to the Rev. C. S. Blackwell and other ambitious polemicists, namely: Can theology maintain itself philosophically and without a Bible? In other words, Is Theism true and based upon fact? For what is the use, now that the Bible authority is discarded, to base an argument upon an assumption which as yet has never been sustained by science and philosophy?

WHAT IS THEISM?

While it will be cheerfully conceded that many good men and women devoutly believe in God, yet it is a well-known fact that all ignorant persons, races, and tribes are likewise abject Theists. In fact, in like proportion that their intellect is crude and approaches a negativ or inactiv condition of mind, is their belief in a God devout and intense. And this universality of Theism, which has often been used as an argument in its support, may easily be accounted for by the universal ignorance existing among all races and tribes in the past. Like causes ever producing like effects, it seems but natural that the causes which led one ignorant nation to solve the problems of existence by assuming a personal God, very like a man, who miraculously created it all a few years previous from nothing, should lead all other ignorant nations to seek a similar explanation beyond the clouds also, and thus, with one brilliant swoop of diplomacy, explain all and establish the, to the present day, very profitable and comfortable order of priesthood.

The origin and basis, then, of Theism is ignorance and assumption. Science, knowledge, fact, truth, reason, and logic all repudiate and lead away from it. The colossal intellect of a Humboldt denying a God goes further to prove that there is no such a being than the unanimous testimony and instinct of millions of savages, and as many more of the average civilized, who loudly affirm that a God does exist. On the principle that a nought is nothing, and a million noughts do not comprise a unit, so all the intellectual noughts in the world combined do not aggregate to the lofty degree of wisdom and knowledge of a Humboldt or a Spencer.

As long as the Christian world resignedly bowed to the authority of the Bible, and this was universally acknowledged to be sacred and infallible, a belief in God was natural and possible; but when Beecher, following in the footsteps of modern scientists, repudiated the first dogma of that ancient record, and when Professor Swing, Dr. Thomas, Minot J. Savage, and a host of others of the most brilliant minds in the church, then boldly assumed the role of iconoclasts, and peremptorily consigned to realms of fiction many others of the most vital dogmas of a heretofore acknowledged divine revelation, the work of destruction was complete. God was dethroned, authority annihilated, and a godless, but infinit and eternal universe, containing within itself all the potencies of life and order, duly established. For the authority of tradition, of Moses, Luke, and John, our leading divines, and a vast majority of our most intellectual men and women, composing their brilliant congregations, hav accepted a gospel according to Beecher, Swing, Thomas, and, I may add, Tom, Dick, and Harry, supposed to be a "new theology," and based upon science and reason.

Original and authoritativ Bible theology, therefore, having been repudiated by our best thinkers in the pulpit, as well as by a vast majority of the best minds among the laity, and to-day being upheld only by the more ignorant of the Moody school, the followers of "the two Sams," and those intelligent believers unwilling to reason and to investigate the matter for themselvs, the question "Can Theism be maintained by science and reason?" becomes one of utmost importance, and requires the immediate attention of all lovers of truth, in view of a speedy settlement.

THE GLORY OF THE UNIVERSE PROCLAIMS "THERE IS NO GOD!"

When Galileo invented the first telescope, he unconsciously constructed the instrument of death that annihilated the ancient and mythical God. While the world was still in blissful ignorance concerning the grandeur, magnitude, and true aspect of the universe, when the popular and only idea of nature was that derived from the first pages of Genesis, then, indeed, it seemed reasonable to accept the hypothesis of a creator and ruler of the world. But when science, with its increased power of vision, and its newly-discovered facts, proclaimed an entirely new aspect of nature; when, instead of a limited and stationary world, and a few lights made solely for its special benefit, an infinit aggregation of worlds and suns and systems, all moving in spontaneous harmony and order by the laws of their own being, were revealed to their amazed vision, then, indeed, the idea of, and faith in, a limited personal God, similar to man, had to vanish. The glory, august magnificence, and infinitude of nature, absolutely banish a God, and make impossible anything beyond, beside, outside, or greater than it. The universe is so vast, so grand, so absolute, so self-evidently complete, eternal, and self-existing, that anything outside, previous, or greater than it is an intellectual mockery.

REASON AND LOGIC PROVE THERE IS NO GOD.

Among the postulates of science which are established with axiomatic certainty are the eternity of time, the infinitude of space, and the eternity and infinitude of matter filling all space. There never was or could hav been a particular period of time in the past, no matter how far back we permit our imagination to carry us, that was not preceded by an eternity of time. There can be no particular point or place in space, no matter how vast the distance conceived, not bounded by infinit space beyond. There can be no limit to matter in unlimited space, because, no matter how vast the immense aggregation of matter, or how numerous the existing worlds, suns, and systems, any particular number, if limited, these and the space occupied by them would not be as one to countless millions in comparison to the space not occupied by anything. In such a case the aspect of the universe would be infinit vacuum, with comparativly but one insignificant point in space occupied by matter—a natural impossibility. But science, reasoning from analogy, and adjusting its telescopes to sweep through the realms of space radiating in every direction, concludes that here, and there, and everywhere, as far as the most magnificent achievements of telescopic art can penetrate, are spread before us countless systems of planets, all working in grand harmony, and that therefore we are forced to the assumption that if the lenses could be transferred to the farthest discernible star, and again penetrate those vast distances, new worlds in countless repetition would again greet our dazzled view. Therefore, knowing all space to be filled with moving bodies as far as we can discover, the conclusion is forced upon us that, ever and ever beyond, the general aspect of the universe is the same.

Again, the philosopher, knowing the natural harmony and order surrounding him to exist to-day, logically concludes that harmony and order are eternal also. Worlds, suns, and systems evolve from preexisting chaos and nebulæ, progress to conditions of life and beauty, exist for the very short period of only a few millions of years, then again disintegrate and go back to their original elements, immediately to commence the evoluting process over again, thus perpetuating nature forever. Eternal change of the finite, eternal statu quo for the infinit. If at any time, generally supposed to hav preceded a so-called beginning, all had been naught, or chaos, all would be precisely in the same condition now. Because what matter (or God) could or did not create during the eternity preceding this assumed beginning, it, or he, would or could never create. Existing to-day, this, then, proves absolutely and beyond a doubt that the universe (not the world) has always existed, and assuming shape and evolving into worlds and planets to-day proves that infinit matter has always assumed similar shape forever in the dim vista of beginningless time, and that consequently there is no beginning, and no need of a creator.

Beginning, end, progress, are attributes only of the finite—never of the infinit. Having at any particular period of time, even ten thousand of million of ages ago, had already an eternity of time preceding it and to accomplish any eventual and possible result, it becomes self-evident that what the universe has evolved, or rather manifested, at the present time it also had manifested countless cycles of ages ago; because what it could not manifest during the eternity preceding any specific time, it, of course, would never produce.

CAN WE BY ANALOGY PROVE A GOD?

All science is Atheistic, and all reason rejects a God. Whatever is an object of knowledge, whatever has outline and form, whatever is tangible and real, whatever can be seen, discovered with our telescopes or microscopes, or recognized by our senses, the infinitly large or small, the far or near—whatever can be resolved into original element, or contains component parts—whatever we can comprehend, understand, weigh, analyze, feel, hear, etc.—all this is not God, but some part or attribute of a natural product. The sum total of all existence is natural and belongs to the material universe; all beyond this, which is naught—this is God. All, everything, is not God; nothing is God. The champion of the "new theology," who has discarded snake and fish stories, still clings to the old or postulates a new God in his own image, because he fails to account for the existence of nature and man. To explain existing mysteries he, like his ape brothers thousands of years ago, flies to realms invisible, and there creates an infinitly greater mystery, and blandly assumes that now the lesser mystery is solved, ignoring entirely, and not pretending to unravel, the greater mystery of his own creating. Not being a part and portion of visible nature, he is satisfied with his profound coup d'état, and prides himself as being so much wiser and more rational than his less evoluted (but more honest) brother. If, however, perchance, this, his identical God, should materialize, and walk the earth, and become a part of actual existence, he would instantly repudiate him also as not possessing qualities of self-existence or of a creature evolved from lower forms, and immediately again fly off into realms of nothing, and there from nothing postulate another God.

God, by virtue of his being, must be intangible, invisible, and absolutely beyond knowledge, or he ceases to be a God. All subject to explanation and proof is not now and never can be a God.

IS THE IDEA OF GOD THINKABLE?

It being scientifically demonstrated that the universe is infinit and eternal, it becomes self-evident that it never was created, and that nothing superior to it can exist beside or outside of it. Two infinits being impossible, consequently a creator is not needed. The sciences of physics and chemistry also establish the fact that whatever effect is produced is the result of causes inherent in matter and natural agencies, and that consequently a God is not needed in the economy of nature. Then, again, a God implies limit, outline, form, and such a limited God could not possibly be a factor to create and rule an unlimited universe. Then, intelligence is strictly an attribute, and known to exist only as a function of animal organism. This necessitates brain, nervous system, and all the other organs of the average beast. But animal organism, in the most extreme case, could not possibly extend over twenty, or, to imagin an extreme giant, over a thousand feet. But what agency can even such a giant be in relation to this world, with the physical impossibility staring him in the face that he could not possibly get beyond our atmosphere and liv? But if not physical, in the image of man, and like one once said to hav "walked in the garden," as originally defined in Genesis, what, then, is God? Hav not Rubens, Angelo, and Kaulbach all presented him with a mantle to cover his nakedness?

It won't do! When the church reasons and the people think, theology must fall.

WHAT IS ATHEISM?

Atheism is Naturalism, Materialism, Realism, Positivism. It adores and venerates the actual, the real, the true, the good, the beautiful, and the lovely. For a basis it has the universe, the sum total of all existence; and, instead of a four-limbed creator or a being of air, it has the life and potencies pervading each atom. To this all-pervading force, filling infinit space and each particle of matter, it traces all phenomena, and thus, instead of vastly increasing existing mysteries, by adding a mythical creator, it reduces and solves them as far as possible. It bows only at the shrine of science, philosophy, music, art, nature, and at the feet of noble men and women. Prompted only by earnest love of truth, it struggles faithfully to dethrone a monstrous tyrant in the sky, and to elevate man to the highest rank attainable by living creatures. This throne will be supported, not by bayonets, guns, or dynamite, but by science, reason, liberty, justice, charity, and fraternity. Its mission is to annihilate all evil and to retain and support all that is needed to better the condition of mankind during life. It will teach a morality more emphatic, more absolute, and more practically reformatory than that taught by the church.

Atheism is born of honesty, and ever associated with superior intellectual endowment, mental research, and moral heroism. No motiv is thinkable why a man should pronounce himself an Atheist if not the necessary result of honest thought and struggle—unlike the church, which indirectly offers immense premiums for memberships and hypocrisy. It requires no intellectual effort to be or remain a Christian. We are born so, and inherit and retain our religion as we inherit our nationality, sex, or language. If we never think a thought, we remain Christians; but to renounce the beliefs of our fathers requires labor, study, courage, and an unflinching determination to attain truth and nothing but truth, regardless of sacrifices.

Theism is crushing, humiliating; resisting all culture or intellectual advancement, it progresses only when forced to by the onward march of a scientific Atheism. Civilization advances in spite, never on account, of it. It incarcerates the intellect and demands abject submission to the dictates of the priesthood. You must submit blindly, believe blindly, and pay out your money blindly; in short, giv up your body and mind resignedly—not to God but to the priest. I am ready, and now cheerfully offer my last dollar to Christ or to God, and will cheerfully kneel down and worship them, if they will only reveal themselvs. But as yet they hav not asked me. One good man and two good ladies asked me to-day to contribute to their respectiv churches—this is as close a view as I ever get of Christ. But not one dollar ever reaches Christ or God; it all goes into the spacious pockets of the priest and the church.

On the other hand, Atheism is ennobling, elevating, exhilarating. It lifts a man up in his own estimation and endues him with new life and vigor. From a poor, wretched serf whom the Lord could extinguish at any moment as a man can a fly, he is exalted to the throne of a king. He knows and ac knowledges no one superior or above him, but is only subject to the immutable and ever just laws of nature, which ever kindly warn him to do right, be virtuous, and a life of happiness will be his certain reward. The terrible hallucination which is fostered by all churches, that some superhuman agencies in air control his fate, and which crushes down and the haunts all true Christians every moment of their life, has vanished, and his journey through life and to death will be serene and content. OTTO WETTSTEIN.

Freethought in England.

V.—FREETHOUGHT IN THE CHURCH.

Your readers are doubtless aware that the authorized version of the Old and New Testament in recent years has undergone revision, and those who hav not read the revised version cannot be certain whether they believe it or not. Now, thousands of Christians are in this predicament. They know what Christianity was years ago when they got their beliefs from the old version with the assistance of their spiritual pastors and masters; but what it is to-day, amid the confusing declarations of the parsons and the more liberal minded free-lance kind of members of the church, they are altogether unable to determin. Moreover, they are too lazy or apathetic to read the new version and judge for themselvs. A week or two ago a majority of members of the Congregational Union decided not to invite the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher to address their meetings at Norwich because the American theologian was not orthodox enough in his views. What this divine's views are your readers probably know better than I can tell them. Over here, however, he is credited with disbelieving in the so-called science of the Bible; in the rib story, the fall, and in the flood; in the tower of Babel, and in many of the Bible miracles; but I am sure he does not go half so far as many clergymen of the Church of England it has been my pleasure to meet.

The late Bishop Colenso went as far as repudiating the Pentateuch altogether. With a fine, clear vision, he saw through the follies and absurdities of the Jewish writings; as a scholar he detected the errors at once, and as an honest man he proclaimed them to the world.

A short time ago it was my pleasure to meet in discussion at Northampton the Rev. Prof. John Symes, of Nottingham. I found this gentleman a greater heretic than the late bishop of Natal. Among his declarations, in defending himself against my attacks, he said that no council of the church had ever authoritativly affirmed the doctrin of the inspiration of the Bible. Moses, or whoever wrote the Pentateuch, in his view, was inspired, but Shakspere was more so, and so were Milton and Darwin. Indeed, he regarded Darwin as a greater authority on the "Descent of Man" than Moses; for the latter merely wrote up to the exact measure of his knowledge—which was very limited, as he lived in an ignorant and barbaric age, and his work necessarily revealed the ignorance and barbarism of the times.

Nor would the reverend professor defend the morality of the Old Testament. This he regarded as the best morality possible in such an age as that in which it prevailed.

Further, he was prepared to say that he did not believe in the miracles of either Old or New Testament—save two—the miraculous birth and the resurrection of Christ—and these only when I pressed him to define in what sense he could describe himself as a Christian, and further in what way he differentiated himself from a Secularist who admired Christ as a man and who was prompted from that admiration to call himself a follower of the Nazarene.

In all conscience, the church is broadening, and Christianity is becoming the vaguest of religions, when it can admit such a clergyman as Professor Symes within its fold.

In another discussion, Canon Shuttleworth (a minor canon of St. Paul's cathedral) admitted not only that animals "may possess immortal souls, but vegetables too." Might we not well exclaim, O wise theologian! verily thy creed is as plastic as a nose of wax? Fancy an immortal cabbage! or an everlasting carrot! Ah! but perhaps after all the divine only meant that matter was indestructible, and that therefore there is an immortality for every particle of matter in the universe. But Shakspere made Hamlet proclaim that long before Canon Shuttleworth was born, and Greek philosophers affirmed it before Christ was heard of. The prince of Denmark well expressed it:

> Imperial Cæsar, dead and turned to clay;
> Might stop a hole to keep the wind away.
> Oh, that the earth which kept the world in awe
> Should patch a wall t' expel the winter's flaw!

But if Canon Shuttleworth really believes in the indestructibility of matter, logically, he ought to giv up his belief in the creation of the universe by God, for is it not rational to conclude that that which is indestructible could never hav begun to be—ergo, matter is eternal? And when it is remembered that the same quality belongs to force as to matter, we hav the possible potentiality from which all phenomena might result, as Tyndall once observed, "without the meddling of the Gods."

Another bold, heretical parson, in many respects the bravest of them all, is the Rev. Stewart W. Headlam. He calls himself a "Christian Socialist." He is a "Land Nationalizer" and "Malthusian;" he has identified himself with many of the movements led by Bradlaugh, believes in the drama, and often descants on the grace and skill with which the ladies of the ballet comport themselvs on the boards at the Alhambra, much to the disgust and dismay of many of his Christian brethren. Several years ago he got into disgrace with his brothers of the cloth at Bethnal Green because he said from the pulpit that a certain music hall vocalist was more popular among the masses than the bishop of London.

It was a fact, but it lost him his berth as curate; he subsequently lost a similar position because of his pronounced Radicalism. But, while the clergy and the bigots generally do not like Mr. Headlam, the people admire his courage, and giv him generous support.

On the whole, I find quite as much liberality of thought among the clergy of the Church of England as among dissenting bodies, except, of course, the Unitarians. Many of the latter, however, are exceedingly liberal, especially in the provinces. At Huddersfield I once heard a Unitarian minister deliver a sermon on "The Peace of God," which went as far as Mr. Savage in your own country.

There are plenty of Agnostics here, however, who would be glad to listen often to such men as these, men who are true Freethinkers, but who still cling to a few fascinating words, even though they fail to convey any definit meaning. Some of the most advanced Unitarians go as far as Agnosticism, but they imagin there is some utility in the forms and ceremonies of religion, and to these they pay a servil homage as senseless as that shown by the rudest barbarian toward his fetiches.

From Unitarianism to pure Theism, and from this to Positivism, and from Positivism to absolute aggressiv Freethought, are only short steps, and they are steps which clear and courageous thinkers are sure to take sooner or later. Remove the anthropomorphic conception of deity from the human mind, and what remains? Nothing but nature, the eternal, the limitless, the one existence. Bishop Butler's argument against the God of Deism is unanswerable; the God of nature he demonstrates to be quite as wicked, cruel, and unjust as the God of so-called revelation. For Nature is neither good nor bad. She regardeth no man. She mows down the good and bad alike indifferently. All men she kills once, and sometimes by the most painful of processes—by earthquakes, famins, disease, war, starvation, and by a hundred other insidious modes which no being of infinit wisdom and goodness could possibly hav devised. The Theist may talk of the "Infinit Spirit," the Pantheist of the "Eternal Essence," the Agnostic of the "Great Unknowable," and Matthew Arnold of the "Indefinable Something" that is "making after righteousness," but they are all using meaningless terms, which express nothing but the limit of man's knowledge of nature.

No doubt, it is a praiseworthy thing for philosophers to coin such phrases; it shows, at least, that they are anxious to make fine distinctions.

But, do what he will, man cannot get beyond nature, and it were infinitly wiser for him to study nature's modes—to learn to conquer her destructiv forces, and to devote his best energies to such work the utility of which can be tested in this world, whether there is another or not—than to bother himself unceasingly with a problematical being, about whose existence he now knows that nothing whatever can be known. ARTHUR B. MOSS.

The Talmud.

The composition of the Babylonian Talmud covers a period of a thousand years, from the time of the captivity until about 500 A.D. The Jerusalem Talmud was completed more than a hundred years earlier. The first complete edition of the two was printed at Venice in 1520–1523—the Babylonian in twelve folio volumes, the Jerusalem in one.

For more than a thousand years, to wit, from A.D. 553 until 1599, the church denounced the damnable work, and in the fifty years prior to 1599 it was burnt in mass no less than six times by order of the popes. Pius IV. (1555–1559) permitted a new edition to be published only on an express stipulation that the name Talmud, on the title page, should be expunged.

The third edition, 1578, exhibits some curious examples of Catholic censorship. Fearing that certain names, for example, Rome, capitol, and Jupiter, meant Christian, Vatican, and pope, those words were changed so as to refer to other countries; consequently the Hebrew writer was made to indicate the capitol of Persia, and Jupiter of Aram or of Babel. And lest, under the guise of gentile, only Christian should be understood, that word was changed to Egyptian, Aramaen, Amelekite, Arab, Negro, etc.

One of the renowned champions for the preservation of the Talmud was Johann Reuchlin, professor of Hebrew and Greek at Tuebingen. For the noble stand he took against the burning of Hebrew literature he endured much persecution. Forty-seven councils of the theological faculty at Paris were held solely to condemn him. But he was upheld by several German princes, and the result was that two years before his death the Talmud was saved from burning. This was in 1520. In the same year the first volume of the complete Talmud was published, and in the same year the bull of the pope was burnt by Martin Luther.

The Talmud consists of two parts—the Mishna and the Gemara. The Mishna is a collection of ordinances, rules, and interpretations given by various rabbis from the date of the founding of the second temple, about 400 B.C. to A.D. 200. These were collected in the year 219 by Rabbi Jehuda the Holy, at Tiberias, on the Sea of Galilee. "Many of the rabbis whose sayings are recorded in the Mishna," says the Rev. S. Baring-Gould, "lived in the time of our Lord or shortly after, and yet not the smallest reference is made to the teaching of Jesus, nor even any allusion to him personally. Although the Mishna was drawn up beside the sea of Galilee, at Tiberias, near where Jesus lived and wrought miracles and taught, neither he nor his followers are mentioned once in the Mishna. . . . Jehuda the Holy says not a word about Christ or Christianity."

The learned author above quoted makes an elaborate, but, in our judgment, a futil attempt to account for the silence of the Mishna and of the contemporary writers, Josephus and Justus, of Tiberius, concerning Christ and Christianity. We say futil because there was no Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate, but a Jesus was stoned and hanged about a hundred years before, as the Rev. S. Baring-Gould himself abundantly proves by translating numerous passages from the Gemara. Indeed, he distinctly concedes that "the date of the Talmudic Jesus is something like a century earlier than that of Jesus of the gospels," and says that "learned Jewish writers hav emphatically denied that the Jeshu of the Talmud is the Jesus of the gospels."

The Talmudic Jesus was stoned and hanged on the day before the Passover, not on the holy Passover day as the blundering synoptic gospels describe the crucifixion. ANTICHRIST.

Mr. Bowman's Epigrams.

Politics, like religion, has become a hereditary disease. Truly has it been said that the iniquities of the fathers are visited upon the sons.

Of two evils, a person should choose neither and vote the labor ticket.

A man had better lose his vote by voting the labor ticket than his character by voting against it.

Democrats always tell how much the Republicans hav stolen, but never say how much they would like to steal themselvs.

Politicians, instead of doing something for their country, want their country to do something for them.

They tell us that a poor man must hav a poor opinion.

They tell us that the laboring men hav no right to complain, but we will complain so long as a dishonest rich man is thought more of than an honest poor man and vice in silk is thought more of than virtue in rags.

A man with no money has no rights.

Party rule is the reigning curse of the age.

The big party says to the little people, "You must vote for my man, or not vote at all. We hope, at least, that we will hav a chance to vote for Henry George for the next president of the United States. And if merit can ever be rewarded, he will be elected.

In Washington territory we feel proud that women hav a right to vote, and the first thing the men know in the East, the women will all come to this territory.

Oakville, W. T. GEORGE W. BOWMAN.

DR. H. GRATTAN GUINNESS has refused to debate at Melbourne with Joseph Symes. The leading men in the city dissuaded him from making a fool of himself, or rather being made a fool of by "that cunning Infidel." We presume this Grattan Guinness is the gentleman who organized that famous ticket-meeting at Exeter Hall against "Bradlaugh." It wasn't very successful after all, and Grattan Guinness seems to carry his ill luck about with him.—London Freethinker.

Episcopalianism Going Backward.

The Episcopal "House of Bishops" has issued a pastoral letter to the churches significant for its conservativ and retrogressiv tendencies. Like all church authorities the bishops first deplore the fact that the world is not yet in heaven, but living as though the earthly life is all it expects to know; after which they lay down rules for the guidance and governance of such people as are foolish enough to obey them. It is these rules which render the document significant.

Episcopalianism is generally regarded as a free-and-easy kind of sectarianism, not requiring much of its believers. The Thirty-Nine Articles form such a terrific creed that no one in these days expects to believe them. Like some ancient laws, they are so anachronistic that they cannot be enforced. But here come the bishops with a pastoral letter, almost Roman Catholic in the severity of its religious demands. Wealth, and ease, and comfort are denounced; what the church calls worldliness, but which is only another name for contempt of theology and theologians, is especially deplored, and modern civilization is pointed to as dangerous. Infidelity, of course, comes in for its share of condemnation, and its cause is traced to "the enlargement of knowledge, scientific discoveries, activity of the press, fearless speculation, and facility of propounding and urging the wildest theories." This is the Infidelity that "seeks to subvert men's faith in the word of God, declaims against the institutions of Christianity, and ventures to question the very existence of the Lord God Omnipotent." Another kind of Infidelity is "the insidious, lurking foe, creeping into our schools, colleges, and homes, infecting to a large extent the literature of the day, and spreading its latent poison in many unsuspected ways." Again, the church is troubled by the pernicious activity of the women. The bishops say:

"That household religion and morality hav changed, and are still changing, for the worse, is recognized by all Christian people as one of the dark omens of the time. The causes are not far to seek. Two theories starting from opposit premises, but both alike the product of the antichristian and secular tendency of the day, hav been eating like moth and rust into the domestic conscience, and thus sapping the very foundations of home life. The one theory declares the individual to be the supreme unit of society, and so demands for every individual complete and equal freedom. It affirms all discriminating legislation based upon differences of sex to be degrading and tyrannical. It teaches that, as the only ground of marriage is the consent of the contracting parties, so the continuance of marriage is rightfully dependent on the circumstance of mutual agreement. It declares that any other view of marriage converts it into the worst bondage known to our law. Admitting no power, or privilege or disability in one sex not common to the other, and claiming for woman an absolute control over her patrimony and acquisitions, as well as over her person, it does not hesitate to affirm as one of its ultimate dogmas that there is 'no more reason why the woman should take her husband's name in marriage than why he should take hers.'"

That women should presume to think that the law ought not to discriminate against them simply because they are women, and that a woman is as much an individual as her husband, is regarded by the bishops as exceedingly sinful, and contrary to the "Christian law of the household." The first call of the church, say they, is to build up the family anew upon the foundations originally built of God, and this household must determin legislation of the state which affects the well-being of the family. That is to say, the family of to-day must conform to that of centuries ago, woman must take the place accorded her by Paul, and the state must legislate to keep both the family and the woman in their proper places. The idea of the church is that the family, not the individual, is the unit of society, and this unit is represented by the man. Women and children belong to their husbands and fathers. This revives the patriarchial system, and pleases God who instituted it.

Another complaint of the church is that education is being taken from the hands of the church—that public opinion has lapsed into the perilous heresy of modern Secularism, that public schools can best do their proper work when giving no religious teaching whatever. This opinion of the public the bishops unsparingly condemn.

There are other incidental sources of grief to the bishops, but the foregoing are the great trials of the church. To overcome the enemy the bishops urge "those over whom the Lord has made us shepherds to giv personal efforts to stay this flood of Infidelity which is sweeping over our land." For the sake of accomplishing this work, the church calls upon all Christian sects to unite, and offers as a basis of union the Nicene Creed, the two divine sacraments, the open Bible, and that apostolic order which is the witness and keeper of these to the end of time. This apostolic order being Episcopalianism, it may be parenthetically noted that the offer of union is upon the condition that all Christians become Episcopalians. This is not an original utterance. Every sect is willing to hav union when every other sect joins its church.

From the foregoing it may be seen that another body of sectarians are turning their faces toward Rome. In England this movement has been noticed for several years. Various English rectors hav been tried for extreme ritualistic practices, and some of them hav gone so far as to institute the confessional. American rectors hav been less rash. This pastoral letter, however, expresses opinions and sentiments identical with Roman Catholicism, and goes to show that the ultimate division of the civilized world into Roman Catholics and Infidels has drawn one step nearer.

Andover and Girard.

Five Andover Theological Seminary professors are to be tried by the Andover Seminary Board of Visitors for breach of trust, inasmuch as they hav publicly taught that the heathen who never heard of Christ may hav a time of probation after death, in which to learn the glories of Christism, and get into the fold.

The charge that this unsubstantiated notion is a breach of trust is founded upon the following extracts from the constitution and creed of the seminary:

"Every professor shall be a man of sound and orthodox principles in Divinity, according to that form of sound words or system of evangelical doctrins drawn from the scriptures, and denominated the Westminster Assembly's Shorter Catechism" (Constitution, Art. xi).

The creed declares:

"That Adam, the federal head and representativ of the human race, was placed in a state of probation, and that, in consequence of his disobedience, all his descendants were constituted sinners; that by nature every man is personally depraved, destitute of holiness, unlike and opposed to God, and that previously to the renewing agency of the divine Spirit all his moral actions are averse to the character and glory of God; that, being morally incapable of recovering the image of his creator, which was lost in Adam, every man is justly exposed to eternal damnation, so that except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God; that God, of his mere good pleasure, from all eternity, elected some to everlasting life, and that he entered into a covenant of grace to deliver them out of this state of sin and misery by a redeemer; . . . that perseverance in holiness is the only method of making our calling and election sure; that they who are effectually called do in this life partake of justification, adoption, and sanctification, and the several benefits which do either accompany or flow from them; that the souls of believers are, at their death, made perfect in holiness, and do immediately pass into glory, but that the wicked will awake to shame and everlasting contempt, and with devils be plunged into the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone forever and ever."

Congregationalism is religion fossilized, and the fossil is jealous of a new thought. No matter that the new thought is as absurd and unprovable as the old dogmas are cruel, the fossil wants none of it. Growth of itself is heresy; expansion is theologically criminal. A fossil never grows; only live things like flowers grow. And why, ask the Congregational relics of Andover, should anyone else get a new idea? A Collection of Fossils, therefore, will "try" the new growth.

Who, nowadays, believes this creed? Who accepts "Adam" as the head and representativ of the race? What misanthropist so sour as to affirm that by nature every human being is personally depraved, and justly exposed to eternal damnation? Who so thickheaded as to believe that foreordination, election, justification, adoption, and sanctification are the "open sesame" to heaven? Who is there so lost to all feelings of mercy and humanity as to affirm that a good God dooms anyone to an eternity of burning in fire and brimstone? Such stuff was fit for the long ago, when men and beasts were but a slight remove one from the other, but it certainly "lags superfluous" in these days of comparativ enlightenment.

But if the professors of Andover hav violated the charter of the institution in teaching a more enlightened religion than their predecessors were civilized enough to believe in, what shall be said of the trustees of Girard College in Philadelphia, where, in direct opposition to the terms of the bequest of the Infidel founder, the rankest superstition is daily inculcated? And here we must giv great credit to Mr. W. J. Potter, of the Boston Index, for having presented this question in a remarkably clear light. The Congregationalist, a religious paper which strongly urges the prosecution of the Andover professors, print the following paragraph concerning the exercises at Girard College:

"There is a growing feeling among many thoughtful people, who do not acknowledge themselvs as believers in evangelical truth, that its principles, after all, are the wisest that can be used in training youth. An illustration of this came up recently at Girard College, where no clergyman is knowingly allowed to enter the grounds, and the officers are required to provide instruction 'only in the purest morality.' But not long since a visitor was present at a chapel service in the college, and was happily surprised to find the exercises truly Christian. They were conducted by the vice-president, a warm-hearted Presbyterian, who gave an address from the text, 'Acquaint thyself with God.' His audience was com posed of 1,050 boys, between six and seventeen years of age, very quiet and orderly, and all of them fatherless. The matron, on being asked by what examples the life of the teachers is nourished, replied, 'I strive to lead the boys directly to Christ.' Thus it seems that, in carrying out the requisition to provide 'the purest morality,' nothing meets the case so well as the life and teachings of the Lord Jesus."

The first sentence of the Congregationalist's paragraph, says Mr. Potter, seems to imply that the management of the college had at some time been entrusted to persons holding Liberal views of religion similar to those held by Mr. Girard, and that they hav come to see that their views will not work well in training the young. But this must certainly be a misapprehension. Such a choice of management would hav been but just; but, as a matter of fact, we think that the direction of the college has always been in the hands of "evangelical believers." It has surely been so for many years—for all the years since it became an institution of conspicuous public interest. And during all these years, its directors appear to hav been trying to see how much of the system of "evangelical truth," as interpreted by orthodox Christian sects, they can convey into the college under cover of the decision of the court. They hav now got pretty nearly the whole of it in. And what the Congregationalist looks upon in such a congratulatory spirit, we are compelled to regard as a most immoral perversion of a solemn trust, and an audaciously illegal violation of the court's decree.

For instance, the writer further points out, though the college doors are still locked against all clergymen according to the letter of Girard's will, men who hav been regularly educated for clergymen, and to all intents and purposes are such except that they hav not yet passed through the process of ordination, are admitted to the college and hold religious services there after the manner customary in orthodox churches. They hav built a chapel on the college grounds designed particularly for the religious instruction which Girard's will expressly proscribed. It has been stated that they hav contemplated the appointment of a regular chaplain for the place, if they hav not already carried the idea into effect—a man, probably, prepared theologically for the ministry, but from whom the formal ceremony of ordination is withheld in order to enable him to enter the college door. Further, these religious services which the college authorities hav introduced are doctrinally sectarian. They are based on the orthodox interpretation of Christianity. Apparently no attempt is made to confine them within the limits of the court's decision. The "visitor" whom the Congregationalist quotes was "happily surprised" to find the services so satisfying to his own religious faith. He seems to hav had an instinctiv feeling that he ought not to hav expected this, considering the terms of Girard's bequest; but the directors, it is to be feared, hav effectually silenced long ago all such qualms of conscience. The service in doctrin, form, and spirit is what one might witness in any orthodox church outside, except that it is of a more juvenil character.

The "Manual," or service book, which is used in the college chapel is saturated throughout, in its hymns, prayers, doxologies, and arrangement of responsiv readings, with the peculiar orthodox theology. The lost and helpless condition of the human race, the coming of God into a human form to atone for human sin, the washing away of human guilt in the sacrificial blood on Calvary, and man's salvation thereby—these are the prominent doctrins of the Manual. It contains prayers addressed to Jesus, and the Trinity is directly taught or implied in almost every part of it. "God, the Father, . . . ; God, the Son, . . . ; God, the Holy Spirit, defend and aid us," says one of the prayers.

"Glory be to God the Father,
Glory be to God the Son,
Glory be to God the Spirit,
Great Jehovah, three in one," says one of the hymns. Here are other specimens selected at random:

"In thy promises I trust,
Now I feel the blood applied;
I am prostrate in the dust,
I with Christ am crucified."

"I bring my guilt to Jesus,
To wash my crimson stains
White in his blood most precious,
Till not a spot remains."

It was, doubtless, just such mentally and morally confusing dogmas as these which Stephen Girard was thinking of when he wrote in his will that he desired "to keep the tender minds of the orphans free" from them and from the "sectarian controversy" such doctrins engender. But now his noble bequest is, in this respect, perverted from its purpose and used for indoctrinating the minds of the orphans in these very tenets. Nor can it be justly claimed that such doctrins as this Manual is based upon may be taught in the college under the court's decision. They are not non-sectarian; they are not ethical; they are not even "truths in which all Christian denominations concur."

Such is the indictment which the writer whom we hav quoted brings against the trustees of Girard College. The charge against the Andover professors is that to what they believe to be true they hav added what they think "in the mercy of God" may be possible, and their course does credit to their humanitarianism. The Girard managers, in their teachings, hav added to what they know to be true a mass of superstitious dogmas which persons of average good sense know to be false. In prosecuting the first and allowing the last to go free of censure the religious authorities are condemning progress at Andover and encouraging rascality at Philadelphia. In doing this, however, they are but continuing the methods by which Christianity is kept alive in the world.

Colonel Ingersoll and God.

In his opening speech at the recent Congress of the American Secular Union, Mr. Ingersoll, in incidentally alluding to the hope some entertain of a future life, said in substance:

"I hope it will turn out that there is another life. I would like to know that for every tear shed by the suffering poor there is in store a sacred joy. For every martyr I would like to know there is a life that would pay him a thousandfold; but I would not take it myself at the expense of hell for others."

Quoting this, a Methodist editor says:

"The sacred joys that reward martyrdom could hav no bearing on his future state or that of such as he. The alternativ will never be offered him of heaven at the expense of hell for others, but the admission of a man of his spirit and ways of thinking and feeling and talking into heaven would materially modify its desirability as a place of abode to all who love God. The inconsistencies of speech and life that mark these men are a sufficient answer to their blasphemies. Their recklessness and extreme absurdity antagonize the influence of their errors, and it is quite likely to be true, as it has been, that open blasphemy and unfeeling ridicule illustrate the passage: 'Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee, and the remainder of wrath thou shalt restrain.'"

If Methodism requires its editors to be as mean as that, we are thankful we are not a Methodist! If the presence of Robert G. Ingersoll is obnoxious to those who love "God," we are thankful that we do not love that theological monstrosity! If we had to go to heaven, we should hope that it was peopled with Ingersolls. We cannot conceive of a happier lot. If we hav to go to sheol, our unceasing prayer will be that no Methodist editor will be given even standing-room by the fire. Imagination cannot picture a more intolerable existence than life in hell with Methodists.

It is very evident that this editor is not acquainted with the person he denounces, for even Methodists who know Mr. Ingersoll regard him highly. The offense is, therefore, all the more contemptible. A man who slanders a stranger is naturally a mean fellow. We will wager Dr. Buckley (for anyone can see he is the culprit) anything he likes that from all his Methodist acquaintance he cannot pick out a man who has done as great good to as great a number of persons as has Mr. Ingersoll. All sorts and kinds and classes of people—worthy and unworthy—hav profited by Mr. Ingersoll's generosity and services. Mr. Ingersoll has earned hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars, yet he is not a very rich man. Others hav had the benefit of it. His whole life has been one of princely generosity, unselfish action, and immense good to others.

If the possession of this character renders undesirable his presence in heaven, so much the worse for heaven. Mr. Ingersoll can stand it if those can who "love God."

Editorial Notes.

We notice a tendency upon the part of some of the labor papers to make Henry George the issue for the next presidential campaign. It would be much better for the workingmen's prospect of success if they make the issue the principles of their cause and not the man who stood for them in a single mayoralty contest.

A correspondent of the Hebrew Standard writes to the editor to ask if he believes in the ultimate restoration of the Jews to the Holy Land," and the editor answers, "We do, most assuredly." We would advise the editor of the Hebrew Standard to relinquish this forlorn hope, and take up a quarter-section of land out West. The soil is more fertil.

The papers report that the late R. B. Butland, formerly a correspondent of The Truth Seeker, and a prominent Secularist of Toronto, Ont., left an estate valued at one hundred thousand dollars, seven thousand of which was willed to the Toronto General Hospital. It is still in order for religious people to ask what Infidels hav ever done for charity.

The Rev. M. T. Lamb, a Baptist missionary stationed for several years in Salt Lake City, is now in the East describing the religious status of the Mormons to the churches. He says that the young people among the Mormons are irreligious, and at least two-thirds of them are Infidels. If this be so, there is hope for Utah if the Christians will only keep their hands off.

According to the laws of New Jersey, the courts of that state cannot try cases of libel committed on non-residents. It would seem, then, that the first duty of District-Attorney Cutler is to prove that God, Christ, and the Holy Ghost, whom Mr. Reynolds is charged with libeling, are residents of New Jersey. When he has done this, he will be prepared to proceed with the trial.

Jeremiah Hacker has written and printed a lecture, in which he shows the general reputation of the God of the Bible to be bad. To this he has appended two alleged poems, and offers the whole for sale for 10 cents. The lecture will be liked by a great many, and its sale will help the aged couple in their little home at Berlin, New Jersey. Send orders direct to Mr. Hacker.

No act of Mayor Grace since he took the office has pleased the public so well as the appointing of two women on the school board. As a straw, it shows that the Woman Suffragists hav not labored in vain. Miss Dodge and Mrs. Agnew will probably run in more religious exercises than ever. But that is the fault of their education, and is no reason why women should not hav a voice in government.

Recently Joseph Symes, the regular speaker for the Freethought Society of Melbourne, Australia, was called away from the city over Sunday, and he extended an invitation to any one of the Melbourne clergy to occupy his platform for the day. The only condition imposed was that the speaker should reply to criticisms and questions from the audience precisely as Mr. Symes does. Not a preacher could be found to use the platform, all evidently dreading the sharp interrogatories of a Freethought audience. Mr. Symes professes to be willing to fill any Christian pulpit, and answer all comers, stipulating no conditions but a fair hearing and no personal assault. And yet no pulpit is offered him!

A New York daily thinks it will be a little difficult for the female suffragists to understand why the act which the Vermont House of Representativs has passed permitting women to vote requires a property qualification to the amount of $250. It will be a little difficult, in fact, for anybody to understand it. Possibly it is on the theory that it takes $250 to make a woman equal to a man. But since the abolition of slavery there is no reliable basis for such a computation.

Last winter when a Senate committee was investigating the Broadway steal, Alderman Fullgraff was a witness. At that time he reverently raised the Bible, kissed it, and swore there was no dishonesty connected with the voting of the franchise for the railroad. Last week he found his conscience and confessed. But he did not kiss the Bible, choosing to affirm. He seems to go on the principle, the Bible for lying, affirmation for truth. There is a large and valuable moral somewhere in this, and we cannot think that it points toward religious oaths in courts.

John Burroughs, in the Popular Science Monthly, says: "Convince me that the historical part of the Bible is not true, that it is a mere tissue of myths and superstitions, that none of those things fell out as there recorded, and yet the vital, essential truth of the Bible is untouched. Its morals, its ethics, its poetry, are forever true." What stuff for a man to talk! Would he say it of any other book? If not, why of the Bible? The morals of the Bible are infamous, its ethics barbaric, its poetry not comparable to Shakspere. It is disgusting to see men wallow in the mire before the literature of superstition.

The first Sunday evening meeting of the Society of Humanity was held November 21st, and proved a great attraction. The parlors of the Society were crowded to suffocation, although the World's report that several ladies fainted is untrue. The parlors are very handsomely furnished, and when the Society obtains books enough to fill the ample shelves, the rooms will be a most attractiv place of resort. It is the intention of the Society to keep the library open constantly. The discourse listened to was an exposition of Comtism from Mr. Wakeman's standpoint. It was very interesting. It is proposed to hold a reception at the parlors as soon as arrangements can be made. The Committee on Library and Lectures desire us to acknowledge the following sums donated toward expenses of furnishing: D. Foster, $1; S. Lewin, $2; Herman Behr, $15; Eliza Burnz, $5; Agnosticus, $5; James L. Parshall, $5; Clinton Roosevelt, $2.50; J. Offensandt, $3; C. L. Bridge, $3; A. Kost, $3; Fred. Koezly, $3; Louis Cohn, $2.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. Jamieson traveled over fifteen hundred miles to meet his Denver, Colorado, lecture engagement, over the Rocky mountains, stopping long enough in Ogden, Utah, to giv one lecture. Wherever he meets Liberals, he says, it is like greeting the members of one's own family. He had but one day to giv to a visit in Salt Lake City, the heart of Mormondom. He promises an account of what he saw and heard during that notable day. He gained access to the great Mormon tabernacle, the imposing marble temple, etc. He is delighted with Colorado. At his first lecture in Denver he was unanimously called upon to review Rev. Myron Reed, to whom he had listened in the morning, and of whose discourse against "Radicalism" he had taken shorthand notes. He finds an earnest band of Liberals in Denver. He is engaged to lecture in Greeley November 17th, 18th, and 19th; in Longmont November 22d and 23d, and will lecture at other points the remaining week-evenings of his Denver Sunday engagement. Address, Denver, Col., 271 15th st.

F. M. Holland, secretary of the Free Religious Association, writes: The heavy storm on Thursday, November 18th, made the attendance at the Meionaon, Boston, unusually small. After supper, Mr. W. J. Potter, president of the Association, took the chair and introduced Professor Davidson, who spoke on "Every Man for Himself, Justice and Reason for All, and No Hindmost for the Devil to Take." Free religion, he said, does not date from Jesus, but from Socrates. We must not be like the Scotchman who believed in God because "It's the cleish o' the kintra." There is a thousand times more religion in social reform than in going to church. The chairman then announced that the Index must be discontinued with the number for December 30th. Subscribers might hav their money back again, or receive for a proper period either Unity, one of whose editors, Rev. Wm. C. Gannett, spoke later in the evening, or a new paper designed to advocate the same principles as the Index, and with the same contributors in Chicago; and to be edited by Mr. and Mrs. Underwood. This lady then gave a survey of the broad and noble work which was going on in the Association, whose platform was strong enough to bear free discussion. The secretary read the resolutions passed that afternoon by the executiv expressing the gratitude and honor universally felt toward the editors of the Index, and thanking all who hav aided it with pen or purse, and also a list of contributors to the new paper, among whom are W. J. Potter, Felix Adler, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Dr. Felix L. Oswald, M. D. Conway, Rev. M. J. Savage, Professor Davidson, Capt. R. C. Adams, and W. M. Salter. The whole audience was with him as in their name he wished permanent success to the new enterprise, and all happiness and prosperity to Mr. and Mrs. Underwood in their Western home.

Letters from Friends.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 12, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am disgusted with the New York Sun. Its editorial on Mr. Reynolds is shameful. Is it possible that Chas. A. Dana wrote or approved of it? I hav taken the paper for many years; I now want to quit it, if I can select another New York daily whose political principles are Jeffersonian, and whose editor believes in religious liberty.

JEFFERSONIAN.

TULARE CO., CAL., Nov. 3, 286.

MR. EDITOR: As an offset against the lamentable results of Christian teaching that we meet on every side, I giv you some of the fruits of Freethought hereabouts.

A family of eight persons, hopelessly split, and reduced nearly to poverty and want, by priestcraft, was recently reunited on a firmer basis by the presentation of Helen H. Gardener's book, "Men, Women, and Gods," to the Christian side of the house. The result at first was doubtful, but when the light began to dawn, conviction came as irrepressible as the sunlight, and now "Men, Women, and Gods" lies on the table, open to all comers, and the family are again united, prosperous, blessing (whatever that means) the authoress.

For fear the recording angel failed to giv Miss Gardener proper credit in the great book of life, it might be only just to credit it here and now. T. J. C.

LYNDON, ILL., Nov. 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.50 to continue my subscription. I am only a recent subscriber, but will cast my vote for the cartoons. So continue them for the enlightenment of the blinded intellect.

Hip! hip! hurrah! for Geo. Geer in your issue of October 30th. Not only for him, but for every other truth seeker who dares to stand up and proclaim the truth to the world, regardless of whom it may strike—proclaiming the truth on its own merits.

In the number for October 30th Ingersoll says, "I do not pretend to know enough to suggest a remedy for all the evils of society" (italics mine). I would ask, Can he giv or suggest a remedy for some of the evils of society? For instance, the evils of our monetary system? If he can, I think he can suggest something which will eliminate or remedy seven-tenths of the evils of our society. And possibly by applying Henry George's theories the balance might be eliminated or remedied.

In your issue of October 16th Ingersoll, in speaking of the laboring men in connection with legislation, says, "To let them see how little can be accomplished by legislation."

Issue of October 3d: "It may be that very little can be done by law, except to see that they are not absolutely abused." "I hav sometimes thought that I would like to see the laboring men in power, so that they may realize how little, after all, can be done by law." I am for the abolition of all special privileges that are not for the general good." (If some laboring man in Chicago had uttered the above-quoted language, he would in all probability be under sentence of death, awaiting execution, as an Anarchist.) Again, "Now, the laboring people are largely in the majority in this country. If there are any laws oppressing them, they should hav them repealed."

"Should hav them repealed." How? By legislation? No. Then how? Ingersoll should bear in mind that the whole world, orthodox and heterodox, are taking note of his acts and sayings, and if he is honest about wishing to establish among the masses the truth of no theology, or rather the falseness of all theology, he must also be honest in showing up the evils of class legislation. MR. EDITOR: Mr. Putnam's "Plain Talk" has induced me to add a little more. It was with surprise and regret that I read his statements, and had they not come from a source that admits of no question, I would not hav believed them. One by one my idols are breaking. I used to think Infidels approximated almost to perfection. I thought they were as near immaculate as humanity ought to be. I fear I was too confiding, too sanguin.

Mr. Putnam has presented a clean record. Then, good friends, what is the "winter of your discontent?" Speak, and allay all lurking suspicion. If not all, state a few of your griefs, at least.

> Of the three hundred, grant but three,
> To make a new Thermopylæ.

Our secretary is no stranger. Through the press the Liberals hav known him for years. His past is a splendid vindication against slanderous charges. As an advocate of the cause he has espoused he stands almost unequaled. Earnest, talented, eloquent, ready, brave, and defiant, were he to-day in the pulpit which he so nobly forsook, he would be the theme of the loftiest praise and the most exalted eulogy. Financial aid would flow into his purse so copiously that financial need would be unknown to him. With his keen sense of honesty he does not consider this an abnegation, but such cases are very isolated.

As a rule, it is true, Liberals are financially wanting, but that is no reason that the crime of ingratitude should be added to the misfortune of poverty. Nor is this a time for needless complaining. The days that try men's souls are not yet over, and the sunshine patriot must wait. Ever and anon is this "land of Freedom" shutting its prison doors upon some of Freedom's champions, and life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness is little more than a shibboleth.

The question is, shall Freethinkers persist in their efforts for freedom, or ignominiously stack their arms? Their enemies are eagerly watching and waiting. If they continue this intestin war, these anxious enemies will not wait in vain.

We know Mr. Putnam can defend himself, but his cause being the cause of every Liberal is the reason I put my thoughts upon paper, and send them to you.

VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 13, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I see by this week's TRUTH SEEKER our brother, Chas. H. Bauer, has a very interesting letter giving an account of Mr. Watts's lectures in Hastings, Mich. I thought it may be interesting to let your readers know what success greeted him here. I am very much gratified indeed to state that Mr. Watts's lectures here last Sunday proved a grand success in every way, both for the lecturer and the League. We had splendid audiences on both occasions, the subject of Mr. Watts's discourses was, for afternoon, "If a Man Die Shall He Liv Again?—The Secularist's Answer;" evening, "Saints and Sinners—Which?" It was a pleasure to see the great demand for these lectures at the close of the meetings. Liberals everywhere should hear these scholarly lectures, and if they want to enjoy a good, hearty laugh they should not miss to hear the lecture called "Saints and Sinners." We had quite a lively debate following the lectures, wherein Mr. Watts proved himself very skilful indeed. I 's a great pity we cannot get the Christians to put up a representativ to discuss the merits of Christianity and Freethought with Mr. Watts. One would think that as the Christians claim to hav truth on their side they would only be too glad to measure swords with their opponents. But they seem to be afraid, as they do not take up the challenge. Now, when I was a Christian, I was very eager to enlighten my brother in darkness; the result has been that I am landed in Materialism. And I don't regret it either, for it is a thousand times better to be a Freethinker through knowledge than a Christian through fear. It is a pleasure to state that the Liberal public generously supported Mr. Watts in Philadelphia. They appreciate his ability to enlighten the masses, as he is a superior lecturer of the first order. I may say in conclusion that the League has secured the services of Mr. Watts for two lectures for our next Paine anniversary. The subjects of his lectures on that occasion will be, first, "Thomas Paine as a Political Reformer;" second, "Thomas Paine as a Religious Reformer." The League desires me to return thanks to the Liberal public for their generous support to these lectures, which is a pleasure for me to do.

Yours truly for mental liberty, GEO. LONGFORD,
Sec. Friendship Liberal League.

MONTROSE, IA., Nov. 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav in my possession a book of covenants and over one hundred revelations by Jesus Christ to Joseph Smith, and leading men in the Mormon church, through Smith.

Revelation given in August, 1831, is so lengthy I hav written only a part of it, but it is a true copy of said revelation, so far as I hav copied. Now, if the following is worth publishing, all right; if not, all the same to me. I would say, however, that Christ has made some improvement since the year 33. Yours truly, A. CRANDALL.

THE REVELATION.

1. Behold and hearken unto the voice of him who has all power, who is from everlasting to everlasting, even Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. Behold verily thus saith the Lord unto you, O ye elders of my church, who are assembled upon this spot, whose sins are now forgiven you, for I the Lord forgiveth sins, and am merciful unto those who confess their sins with humble hearts: but verily I say unto you, it is not needful for this whole company of mine elders to be moving swiftly upon the waters, whilst the inhabitants on either side are perishing of unbelief; nevertheless, I suffer it, that ye might bear record: Behold there are many dangers upon the waters, and more especially hereafter, for I the Lord hav decreed, in mine anger, many destructions upon the wa ers; yea, and especially upon these waters; nevertheless, all flesh is in mine hands, and he that is faithful among you shall not perish by the waters.

2. Wherefore, it is expedient that my servant, Sidney Gilbert, and my servant, W. Phelps, be in haste upon their errand and mission, etc., etc.

3. Behold I the Lord in the beginning blessed the waters, but in the last days, by the mouth of my servant John, I cursed the waters, wherefore the days will come that no flesh shall be safe upon the waters; and it shall be said in days to come that none is able to go up to the land of Zion upon the waters but he that is upright in heart. And as I the Lord in the beginning cursed the land, even so in the last days hav I blessed it, in its time, for the use of my saints, that they may partake the fatness thereof. And now I giv unto you a commandment that what I say unto one I say unto all, that you shall forewarn your brethren concerning these waters, that they may not journey upon them, lest their faith fail, and they are caught in her snares. I the Lord hav decreed, and the destroyer rideth upon the face thereof, and I revoke not the decree, etc.

4. And now, concerning my servants, Sidney Rigdon, and Joseph Smith, Jr., and Oliver Cowdery, let them come not again upon the waters, save it be upon the canal, while journeying unto their homes, or, in other words, they shall not come upon the waters to journey save upon the canal, etc.

5. And again, verily I say unto you, my servants, Sidney Rigdon, Joseph Smith, and Oliver Cowdery, shall not open their mouths in the congregation of the wicked until they arrive at Cincinnati, and in that place they shall lift up their voices unto God against that people.

OTTUMWA, IA., Nov. 9, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: When the dark clouds of superstition hang threateningly around me, when the jeers and taunts of Christian "friends" become almost unendurable, there still shines in my mental chamber a ray of light from the bright star of Liberalism, placed in the grand firmament of truth by the thinking men and women of this glorious republic; by such noble writers and speakers as THE TRUTH SEEKER staff is composed of.

For many years it has furnished its readers with the grandest, truest, and noblest thoughts, and has ever endeavored to do justice to all, regardless of the opinions they might entertain. But what a dark shadow seemed to pass over its truthful pages as I read the secretary's report of the 6th inst., and became acquainted with the fact that there are some among the Liberal ranks who are dissatisfied with the work Mr. Putnam has accomplished.

It hardly seems possible that any intelligent and honest Freethinker could entertain such unjust thoughts toward one who has spent so much of his time and money in endeavoring to bring humanity from a state of ignorance and falsehood to a standard of truth and justice, and to inspire his fellow-men with nobler motivs and loftier aspirations. As I look back over the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER and see written thereon the "News and Notes" of Mr. Putnam, I cannot but recall the vivid descriptions of those beautiful and sublime sights which nature has in store for the Western tourist; and I doubt not that they inspired our poetical secretary with more heroic patriotism, and removed far, far from him the seeds of selfishness and distrust.

Why all this talk about narrow-minded Christians when we hav within our own ranks those who hav not yet laid aside the mantle of jealousy and who cannot rejoice at the generous and noble traits of character in another?

It is just such people as these who are continually plunging Liberalism into still deeper and darker waters, and so long as there are those among us whose peace of mind is disturbed when another is gaining popularity, or when others advance to a point which cannot be attained by all, just so long will Liberalism remain within the dark and gloomy walls of superstition, and the task which we are striving to accomplish will be surrounded with greater difficulties.

The bloodshot eye of the church is continually watching its prey, for they hav begun to realize that their almighty God, surrounded by his beasts and saints, is suspended in the clouds by only a single thread, and that the touch of a few more Ingersolls will hurl him from his lofty hight and dash him to pieces on the rocky walls of science and Liberalism.

And why should it not be so? For thousands of years the worshipers of this despicable God hav committed every crime, every vice which the human mind could devise, and were it not for Infidelity to-day they would not hesitate to use the same instruments of torture, the same unjust creeds and laws as they did when the beautiful Hypatia met her fate, or when the immortal Bruno felt the flames crackling around his limbs, but who still clung to the idea that liberty is the only happiness for mankind. A thousand times would I exchange my golden harp for a fiery pitchfork than to breath the atmosphere of such a murderer and degraded wretch as the Christians God is represented to be; as he is described in his own book—that blasphemous old Bible! But future generations will behold among the mythological characters of past ages the names of the men and women whom the Bible worshipers wish to meet in heaven, the music of whose voices they wish to hear, and upon whose bosoms they wish to rest. My sisters in the human family, for one moment picture yourselvs reclining on the filthy bosom of old Abraham! No, no! sooner let me embrace the devil himself than touch even the hand of that lascivious old saint.

I wonder if the woman suffragists, who are clamoring so loudly for a God in the Constitution, hav ever pictured themselves walking hand in hand in with these old Bible heroes, and if they ever stop to think into what a condition this country would be plunged if we were compelled to reverence a father, son, and Holy Ghost!

It is indeed a sad sight to see our Freethought women join hands with those dastardly preachers in this suffrage movement. Can they not see that they are digging the grave of Liberalism? And that when they hav once placed the ballot in the hands of the women of this country, not a decade of years will elapse before the Christian priest and preacher will rule supreme?

True, some of the finest intellects in the land are found in the female sex, but they are few in number compared with the vast army of Christian women who, under the influence of priest and preacher, would destroy every vestige of Freethought, and bring the world into another dark age of Christian sway.

While speaking of the magnificent intellects found among the gentler sex of to-day, I cannot help but mention one who is accomplishing such splendid results in the city of Ottumwa—one who has done more to overthrow the power of the church in this city than any other influence, and that one is Mrs. A. H. Colby, of Boston, Mass.

True, noble woman! Although advanced in years she still retains a powerful voice which sends its fearless truth over a large, intelligent audience, which is growing more and more grand in intellectual beauty and unfoldment, and under the leadership of this brilliant intellect will do much to overthrow the power of the clergy and instill into the mind of our young men and women a love for truth and right, instead of teaching them the incredible stories found in the foundation of the Christian church.

All we need in the Liberal ranks is harmony. Let not the shrill notes of jealousy and ingratitude destroy the harmony which exists in our heroic band; let not the church hav the pleasure of seeing us quarrel among ourselvs, but rather let us wear the robe of peace; let us join hands with justice and mercy. As you enter the ranks of Freethought leave all envy and hatred with the orthodox church; there is where it ever has been prominent and ever will be prominent, for in all ages the temples of superstition hav been the resting-places of ignorance, crime, and vice, and as we do not wish to take from their followers that which justly belongs to them. Thus, my friends, will you make Liberalism what it should be—the guiding star to a life of purity, justice, and mercy.

JAMESPORT, MO., Oct. 27, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Many thanks for continuing my paper. Eight years I hav taken your paper, and hav always made arrangements for my subscription before it was due until this time, and shall continue as long as you pour dead shot into superstition.

I hav solicited a great many, but without success, on account of lack of nerve and courage, and fears for popularity and bigotry. This would be a good field, I think, if we could get some lecturers to break the way, and help us to organize, as I think we hav good material; and if we get Mr. J. E Remsburg we will open their eyes, as he has promised to lecture for us at Jamesport soon.

Please find inclosed $6—$5 for my subscription, and $1 for "Golden Throne." I consider it a good missionary work.

MILTON EADS.

STONEHAM, MASS., Nov. 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $2 for my own subscription. I want to assure you (though you don't need it) that your position for justice is understood by most of your readers. I think that those who object to your position are neither Liberal nor thoughtful. We boast of our land of justice, and it is the duty of all public journals to help its enthronement. You will not be frightened, so I need not say aught to keep up your courage. I guess you can whistle through this graveyard of old ideas, and thus keep off the ghosts of dogmas and mental fetters. I am glad you keep yourself and paper free. I tell my acquaintances that I get as much Spiritualism in THE TRUTH SEEKER as in other papers, and I can get both sides of a story, and that is what, I am sorry to say, I can't get in a Spiritualist paper. You giv us columns of Spiritualism, while our Spiritualist papers would not giv us two columns per week of the other side of the question, so I thank you. You are doing a grand work, and one which will help the future. I don't want to flatter, for you get enough of that, but to let you know that many of us appreciate the work you are doing and its methods.

C. FANNIE ALLYN.

PERRINSVILLE, MICH., Nov. 12, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Though a great admirer of your highly estimable paper, I can do no more as an honest man than renew for it again with the $3 inclosed.

Now, with your permission, Mr. Editor, I would like to giv your readers my humble idea of how all things came from nothing, instead of a personal God.

What I understand by the word "eternity" is an endless extension in every direction. Now, what is, or can be, of more extension than what is meant by the word "nothing?" So far "eternity" is nothing. But as "nothing" never could be conceived nor thought of, unless there was "something" at the same time, where could this "something" hav existed but within the very "nothing," and must hav been so infinitly ethereal that to us it would hav seemed there was no difference between the two opposits "Nothing" must hav eternally existed before "something" could hav defined itself to also exist; and, as either of the two is the affirmation of the other, it is self evident that both must hav existed eternally at the same time. Now, as there never could hav been a beyond "eternity," or "nothing," in any direction, there could hav been no possibility of a God to create "eternity," or anything in it.

ROCKFORD, ILL., Nov. 7, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav noticed some experiences related by some of your correspondents lately on the chess question. If you think it worth while to publish, I will relate mine. In the fall of 1864 I sowed some nice, clean white winter wheat. It was not exactly new land, but land that never bore any wheat before. I put it in with a drill, and it had a beautiful growth in the fall. About the end of November snow came on and covered it nicely, except a small knoll of rising ground in the middle of the lot, from which the snow was partly blown off. In January following a thaw came and melted the snow entirely off from that high ground, leaving the rest of the field still covered. A severe frost set in afterward, and we had but little more snow that season. The wheat on that rising ground was all killed. About the 1st of May I examined it thoroughly and found the crown root at the top of the ground entirely dead. By digging deeper down, I found a tiny green sprout coming from the tip of the lower roots. This was invariably the case where the wheat was killed. I let it grow to note the result, which was that this piece of higher ground was pure chess, all in regular drill-marks as the rest of the field; while the rest of the field that was covered with snow was pure wheat, without a speck of chess to be seen. Now, it would be useless for anyone to tell me that I sowed that chess or that it was in the ground before. I hav studied this chess matter ever since, and am convinced that the chess is a miserable abortion that springs from the lower roots of some varieties after the wheat is killed. The white wheat appears to me to be more liable to produce chess when killed than other kinds. I hav used the Odessa as a winter wheat for a number of years, and hav never seen a sprout of chess in it, whether killed or not.

MR. EDITOR: Having worked in the printing office many years, and at many times tried my hand at the editorial quill, givs me good reasons for extending to you my congratulations upon the typographical appearance of your (our) paper, as well as the position you take in all of your editorial writings and clippings. For one, I cannot comprehend why there are so many among your correspondents that take exception to your management, and I hav in many instances been tempted to write the "kickers" to ascertain if they do not, to the very last man, wear a No. 6 hat. If you would not publish their items, and in place of doing so would send them a brick to rub their head, and announce the same in the paper, I think you would put an end to all such silly nonsense.

I am watching Mr. Reynolds's case with much interest, and showed your article in the last issue headed, "Blasphemy," to an elderly gentleman of this place, and he read along until it came to the point where God bumped his toe, was rocked in the cradle, changed his underwear, etc. Then he said: "Why, it's the truth, and should be posted up in every public place in the world!" And furthermore he wound up by saying that the Christian religion was the most abominable, silly, absurd, unreasonable, of all religions, and that the josh house was and is far superior.

I am greatly interested in every niche and corner of your paper. I lived in Jersey two years, and if they incarcerate Mr. Reynolds, they can just mark it down in black and white that "they know not what they do." And may it be like bread cast upon the waters, etc.—i. e., that we may play a little game of tit for tat. I do not approve of that kind of business, neither do I approve of kindred wickedness in the world, but I herewith advise no man to strike me on the right cheek in anticipation of receiving that stale old doctrin that Christ set forth—not without good cause.

Inclosed find $3 for the assistance of THE TRUTH SEEKER in any way you think best.

ALPH. N. BURGESS.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Nov. 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The fundamental principle of our civilization throws us all upon our individual resources, and compels us all to practice individualism for our self-preservation, whether we desire to or not. Individualism logically requires and compels the individual to be a law unto himself, to fold himself, as it were, within himself, and care for none but himself, which is Anarchism pure and simple. Happily human instinct rebels against such barbarous inhumanity, and trends to collectivism, which is the antipode of Anarchism. Collectivism logically requires that the conservation of the rights, interests, and well-being of the individual shall be the special object and concern of collectiv thought and action, which should make it inexpedient for any individual to take thought for himself what he shall eat or drink, or wherewithal he shall be clothed, for all those requirements should be amply provided for by collectiv wisdom, will, and action. The Bible philosophy regards the whole human race as a unit, which is ultra-collectivism. Then Anarchism is but the fundamental principle of our civilization carried to its logical finality. Collectivism requires the annihilation of the fundamental principle of our civilization to make it practicable. If men should be hanged for advocating Anarchism, what should be done with the greater sinners who advocate collectivism? My being an uncompromising champion of Bible philosophy should make the solution of this question a matter of vital importance to myself, personally, and there are possibly a few others in the same boat who would think that going to jail for rejecting and reviling the Bible is preferable to being hanged by the fiat of a Christian community for advocating the fundamental principle of the Bible carried to its logical finality. Therefore, I hope you will not call a halt on the discussion of this subject in THE TRUTH SEEKER until it is probed to the bottom.

MYRTLE CREEK, OR., Nov. 9, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: What has the church done for humanity. It has drenched the earth with human gore. It has sacrificed millions of innocent creatures for its crimes. It has invented implements of torture for those whom it denounced as heretics. It has robbed mankind of more than half their usefulness and happiness. It has raised the worst of men to the position of saints, and excommunicated its best men and put some of them to death. It has built inquisitions and monasteries, and filled the earth with drones, hypocrits, and usurpers. It has fought against learning and science. It has tried dead men for heresy, and confiscated the homes of their widows and orphans. It has burnt men and women at the stake for Freethought. It has dragged and beaten some to death, and even scraped the flesh from their bones.

To-day it givs poor Wales thirteen thousand priests. In Ireland it is belligerent. It has always robbed poor Ireland. It has collected the orphan's penny, and the widow's mite, and the poor man's shilling for missionary purposes. It has sent missionaries to foreign lands with the Bible and the sword. Conquest has almost invariably followed missionary work. It has always been intimately connected with the wealthy and powerful, either exercising dominion over them or soliciting favors. It is the great power of darkness, ignorance, and superstition. It is divided into many departments, and every department is assuming, dictatorial, and intolerant. It has granted indulgences for crime, and it is its tenet to-day. It is a wholesale doctrin. Its inconsistencies are too numerous to mention. It is driving its best men and women from its ranks. It has thrown many who were not guilty of crime to wild and ferocious beasts. It has fed hungry dogs and ravens with the flesh of human beings. It borrowed mythology from the pagans, and called it the word of God. It forged a great deal of its present Bible, but whatsoever it contains that is true and good it does not practice, but all the false and evil multiplied it strictly observes. It sells the Bible on Sunday which says, Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. It teaches the importance of keeping the Sabbath holy, and at the same time receives contributions from the orphan and the widow.

Of late it claims to be strictly temperate, and has threatened to destroy the liquor traffic with an utter destruction, yet it continues to drink wine in the name of its savior who denounced wine-bibbers, but is their advocate with God the father, who is not any older than himself; in fact, is God born of the Virgin Mary, who is the mother of God, and from God the father and God the son proceeded the Holy Ghost, which begat the father and the son, and these three are one, but "whatsoever sin a man commits against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven him in this world, nor in the world to come." What cheer to those Christians who plead that they cannot sin against the Holy Ghost, and that all other sins shall be forgiven them!

NEWPORT, ME., Nov. 11, 1886.

EDITOR AND READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Alone with my conscience, which is my God, I feel it a duty which I owe to myself and my brothers in prison in Chicago, to earnestly protest against their execution. I shall not discuss the question whether they are "guilty" or not, but even if they are, in the estimation of the government, I protest against their execution, for governments hav no right to take life. If the government executes those men, it is murder, and murder is a crime no matter who commits it. Those men are in prison simply and only for exercising their "inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" in their own way, and no man or body of men has a right to condemn them for what they hav not done. Our forefathers protested against the oppression of the English government, and went through a seven years's war to maintain their rights, and now the world applauds them and calls them "heroes." Whether these men and thousands of others hav greater or less cause for complaint than the Revolutionists of '76 had, I will not stop to discuss; but that they hav just cause for complaint millions all over the world know is true. The South little knew what they were about when they hung John Brown. They did not know that thousands of their sons would lay down their lives to pay the penalty; and so it will be if those seven men are hung in Chicago; a harvest of blood will be the price of the crime of hanging those men. If the authorities who are to do the awful deed think to escape the penalty, that sure compensation will not follow their murderous work, they or their children will liv to see they are mistaken. It would seem that the rulers in Chicago and Illinois ought to know that hanging men for mere words, no matter how strong those words might hav been, never did prevent others from doing the same thing. The wealth producers of the world will not stop protesting against oppression, even if some of their numbers are wickedly murdered. And if the government kills those men, no matter what they may hav said, I, for one, enter my earnest protest against the outrage as unjust, without excuse, and an enormous crime!

Mr. Editor, I kindly ask you to print my protest, for I send it as a solemn duty I owe to my condemned brothers now in prison awaiting execution the 3d of December next.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

KENT, O., Nov. 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me space in your valuable paper to say that I am a truth seeker, a Freethinker, and a Liberal in my views, seeking for knowledge, trying to sustain good morals, etc. But I hav no sympathy with those who advocate Freethought, free press, and free speech, and carry their freedom so far as to advocate intemperance, freelove, Anarchy, Socialism, Communism, and—shall I add?—cannibalism, for such will be the result of these "isms" if allowed to be adopted into the laws of any country. I do not believe in protecting any man or men who will advocate the killing of any officer of the law who has been chosen to protect our property, our lives, and that of our wives and little ones. Down with a traitor wherever he is found. If our laws are wrong, improve them by the ballot, and not by disobeying them, by committing a still greater wrong.

Neither do I believe in disobeying the law of marriage. If we do not esteem the one of our choice as worthy of our affection and protection, we should not seek, by private contract, to giv liberty to our sexual desires.

Man is only superior to the lower order of the animal kingdom so long as he, by his superior knowledge, elevates himself above them in his customs. I am not in favor of Freethought to demoralize human nature, and debase myself to a lower grade of animals.

I do not believe in the practice of ridiculing or speaking in a derisiv manner of the religion or faith of others. We can not catch flies with vinegar. A believer in the scriptures has as good a right to believe that God appeared in Christ in form of man as we hav to think him bigoted and superstitious. All men hav feelings that we are bound to respect. I think Mr. Reynolds used language in his circular insulting, degrading, and detrimental to our cause. Even our great educator of Freethought, "Bob" Ingersoll, the author of my religion, uses expressions in some of his speeches that wound the feelings of those who are really with him in faith. But we must take into consideration that Mr. Ingersoll lectures to please the people as well as to educate them, and what he does under different circumstances we should not always do. I am not a believer in a doctrin where an industrious, hard-working man, one who deprives himself of many privileges to save a dollar for himself and family, should divide his earnings with the beer-guzzling, lazy man that tries to liv off the labor or brain of others.

I am often asked what I propose to giv to mankind for their guidance in place of the Bible. Shall I tell them Anarchy, Socialism, Communism, etc., or shall I say we intend to do away with superstition and priestcraft, educate the mass, build edifices or use the churches to teach the best of morals—love and fidelity, truthfulness, science, economy, hygiene, self-reliance—and everything that will tend to elevate us, and cause each one to be as near perfection as possible? We need no Bible to teach us right and wrong in a simple way, but we do need teachers of high standing—high in moral ideas—with big views, not of selfishness, but for individuality, to lead us up to the true and ennobling point where it is possible, with culture, for man to reach. "Consistency, thou art a jewel."

Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Home of a Tramp.

My home is a castle; in garments of vines
Are shrouded its cold marble walls,
And the sun through the clusters of leaves dimly shines
To cheer the inside of its halls,
Where soft strains of music commingling fuse
Into showers of harmonious sound,
And drip on the ear like the rain or the dews
That fall to baptize the dry ground.

And near it for ages a streamlet has rolled
Its glassy and rhythmical tide,
And I love to gaze into its depths to behold
Its waves down their sandy course glide,
While the mist and the spray dim the luster of day
And cool the red bars of the sun,
And the waves slip and slide on each other and ride
And eddy, gush, bubble, and run.

The blossom-clad yard stretches out through a dale
That is hedged by azaleas and laurel,
And the fresh, fragrant air that I ever inhale
Is blown from this dale green and floral.
All is happiness there, and no sorrow is known;
There I liv, and my castle is—where?
Well, inquisitiv friend, since you ask, I must own
That my castle is built in the atr!

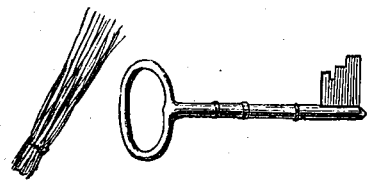
Hygiene.

Hygiene is a study which young and old should be well versed in. The word hygiene means the art of preserving health, and preventing disease. One of the first elements in preventing disease is to hav good ventilation. The windows in our bedrooms should always be kept open. If there is but one window in the bedroom, the top and bottom should be kept open—one for the inlet of pure air, and the other for the outlet of impure air. The air in large cities is purer in the night than in the day. Many diseases are caused from impure air. For example, consumption. But in some cases it is caused from checked perspiration. Another thing to prevent disease is to bathe frequently. Health greatly depends upon keeping the skin clean. The object of bathing is to open the pores and let the impurities of the body out. Many people say they hav taken cold after they bathe, but, in many instances, it is because they do not bathe often enough. In warm climates, and during hot weather, bathing is especially necessary.



After bathing it is a good plan to exercise. The time and manner of bathing is according to the health of the person. A person in sound health can take a bath any time, except after a meal. Now, I hav given two modes of preventing disease, and I will now giv some ways of preserving the health. Our health greatly depends upon the kind of food we eat. The reason why we need food is because there is so much waste and repair that goes on in the system. In two times of life the waste and repair are not exactly balanced. In early life the repair is greater than the waste. In middle age the repair and waste are equal. In old age the waste is greater than the repair. The most important of all food is bread. Bread is made out of wheat and is very nourishing. The white kinds of flour contains more gluten than the darker, and are therefore less nourishing. Bread that is raised is more wholesome than unleavened bread, because unleavened bread requires more mastication than the raised. Wheat bread contains nearly every principle needed for sustaining life, except fat. This is commonly added in articles of diet, especially in butter. In preserving the health we should sleep and exercise enough, so as to giv the system rest and work.

Correspondence.

HOLDEN, Mo., Nov. 14, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a little girl nine years of age. I am studying geography, and like it very much. I think the answer to your enigma number one, of November 13th, is, Tanganyika. CORA CARTER.

GALION, O., Nov. 6, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I think it a very nice paper. I saw letters from children, and I thought I would write and ask you for a place in the Children's Corner. I am a little girl eleven years old. I liv in Galion; it is a city of eight thousand inhabitants. There are nine Protestant churches and two Catholic churches. There are two union schools and one Catholic school. I liv part of my time with my auntie in Springfield, O. I like the Galion school best. I am in D, grammar grade. My teacher's name is Miss Cora Coyle.

When I was in Springfield I took one term in elocution. I sent my auntie a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and she thought it was good. I will spend my Christmas in Springfield. I am going to take some TRUTH SEEKERS with me. This is my first letter, and I will not make it very long. Hoping you will think this worth printing,

I am your little friend, ETHEL VAN ETTA.

[Ethel is a little Liberal missionary, and is just the kind of bright, wide-awake child that we like to see. We are happy to add her name to our list of friends.—ED. C. C.]

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The objectof the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It is unquestionable true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made n the work before us."—N. Y. Sun.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Poetry.

Sage, Singer and Thoughtless World.

Within an old town by the sea
A wise man and a singer dwelt;
The wise man spoke laboriously,
And taught with pain the truth he felt.
The singer scattered everywhere
His careless music to the air.

The wise man and the singer both
Lie now within the churchyard green;
Summer and spring hav plighted troth,
An hundred years they hav not seen.
No traces of their vanished feet
Are in the old, high-gabled street.

And of the wise man's labored words
Not one is now remembered well,
But still, as clearly as spring birds,
The singer's simple love-songs swell,
And in the old town seem a part
Of every home and every heart.

—Portland Transcript.

The Weary Dreamer.

I am tired of planning and toiling
In the crowded hives of men;
Heart weary of building and spoiling,
And spoiling and building again.
And I long for the d ar old river,
Where I dreamed my youth away;
For a dreamer livs forever,
And a toiler dies in a day.

I am sick of the showy seeming,
Of a life that is half a lie;
Of the faces lined with with scheming
In the throng that hurries by.
From the sleepless thoughts' endeavor,
I would go where the children play;
For a dreamer livs forever,
And a toiler dies in a day.

I feel no pride, but pity
For the burdens the rich endure,
There is nothing sweet in the city
But the patient lives of the poor.
Oh, the little hands so skilful,
And the child-mind choked with weeds,
The daughter's heart grown wilful,
And the father's heart that bleeds

No, no! from the street's rude bustle,
From trophies of mart and stage,
I would fly to the wood's low rustle,
And the meadow's kindly page.
Let me dream, as of old, by the river;
And be loved for the dream alway;
For a dreamer livs forever,
And a toiler dies in a day.

Book Notes.

"Fourth National Convention of the Bureaus of Statistics of Labor in the United States," with papers read before the convention, is a pamphlet put forth by Miller, Girton & Walters, Des Moines, Iowa.

The Agnostic Annual for 1887, edited by Charles A. Watts, opens with an article entitled "The Modesty of Agnosticism," by Mrs. E. Lynn Linton, which is followed by other articles of merit. Price 25 cents.

Mr. Charles Watts's pamphlet, "Saints or Sinners: Which?" bearing the imprint of the Truth Seeker Company, is one of the author's best, not to say funniest. It is sharper than a serpent's tooth. Price 10 cents.

"The Knights' Book" professes to set forth the principles and aims of the noble order of Knights of Labor. The author turns casually to a review of the chivalry and knighthood of the Middle Ages. The name of the author is not divulged. Price 20 cents.

"Social Ethics," a pamphlet, contains synopses of addresses before the Society of Medical Jurisprudence and State Medicin by Messrs. Kitchell and Benn and Dr. Wm. McLaury. It is an able, deep, and quite broad discussion of the social evil.

"The Glory of Unbelief" is by Charles Watts, who points out that the greatest achievements of mankind hav been wrought by those who had no faith in the popular religion; and herein lies the glory of unbelief. The price of this neat little pamphlet is 10 cents.

Something tremendous in size is Shoppell's monthly Modern Houses. The 75 or 80 pages are as big as those of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and twice as heavy. It is full of handsome drawings, and tells all about how to build a house—anything from a cathedral to a cottage. Price $1 per number.

Some of the matter which has recently appeared in the wider columns of Lucifer is now reproduced in a pamphlet called "Autonomy, Self-Law—What are its Demands? A Brief Exposition of the Basic Principles of Individualism in its Relation to Society and Government," by M. Harman. It deals with the case of Mr. Walker and his wife, now in jail for being unorthodox in their marriage ceremony. The printer's devil got in some of his most fiendish work in making up the pamphlet, for which the author duly apologizes at the end. This work is calculated to make clear the reason why Mr. Walker and Miss Harman did not call in a minister on the occasion of their accepting each other for better or for worse. Price, 10 cents.

Dr. Caleb S. Weeks, a well-known member of the Manhattan Liberal Club, has written, and Fowler & Wells hav published, a 24-page pamphlet on "The Causes of the Decay of Teeth." As Dr. Weeks is a practical dentist, and a philosopher as well, his pamphlet can be depended upon to impart valuable truths. Price 10 cents.

We hav received from Dr. M. L. Holbrook a 152-page book, with red silk binding and red-edges, bearing the title "Never Forgetting; or, How to Strengthen the Memory," printed on the side and back. The author of this book believes that the memory can be strengthened so as to be many times stronger than it would be without culture. Price $1.

The latest from the pen of Dr. O. B. Whitford is a hundred-page pamphlet on "The Origin of the Christian Bible." Dr. Whitford has made deep researches into the Bibles of all lands, along with Jacolliot, Müller, Champollion, and others, and finds that the Bible myths and fables are mere copies. His little offering should be in all libraries. Price 25 cents.

George William Foote, of London, has had the "nerve" to publish a series of "Letters to Jesus Christ." There is no bashful hesitancy about our English brethren. Mr. Foote desires to know about the incarnation, the crucifixion, the resurrection, the ascension, the miracles, etc., and his letters touch upon these mysterious subjects. Pamphlet, 32 pp; 15 cents.

The "Report of Proceedings of the Thirty-fourth Annual Session of the International Typographical Union" held in Pittsburgh, Pa., June, 1886, is a bulky volume of 312 quarto pages from the press of the Craftsman, Washington, D. C. It contains portraits of G. W. Childs and Anthony J. Drexel, and a fac-simile of the $10,000 draft which these gentlemen gave to the Typographical Union.

The National Secular Society's Almanac for 1887, edited by Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant, is out. It contains a number of good articles and a large amount of tabulated information about English finances. In England the price is sixpence; in America, 25 cents—the difference in price arising from the tariff imposed to protect the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC, to appear next month.

"Objections to the Orthodox Belief in the Resurrection of the Body" is a pamphlet containing the formulated views of Dr. W. H. Benson on this subject. It is almost like slaying the slain to attack this particular phase of the Christian superstition, but those who still believe in the physical resurrection may read Dr. Benson's pamphlet with profit. Address the author, 1225 Filbert street, Philadelphia, Pa.

We hav just printed for Col. John R. Kelso a 12mo book of 245 pages, under the title, "Spiritualism Sustained by the Bible." Among the sub-titles are "Spiritualism Sustained by the Christian Church;" "Spiritualism a Necessity in God's General Government;" "Spiritual Mediumship," and "Objections to Spiritualism Answered." He makes out a strong case—not that Spiritualism is true upon its own evidence, but that it is true if the Bible is. So far as the author himself is concerned, however, he has no doubt of the general truth of Spiritualism, to which he is a comparativly recent convert. This book is not designed to arouse the yearning for a future life in the flinty bosom of the Materialist, but it will put the Christian in a position where, logically, he must accept Spiritualism or reject the Bible. Price $1.

Poker and Religion.

The following story is told about the actors Robson and Crane by the Boston Herald. Mr. Robson, by the way, is an Investigator-reading Freethinker; "Not far from Robson and Crane's summer house at Cohasset there stands in a shady nook a little house of worship, which both the actors are wont to attend every Sabbath regularly—unless the wind is good for a cruise in Mr. Crane's yacht. One bright Sunday morning last summer, while the birds were chirping in the trees to escape sunstroke, and the sheep and cattle browsed on the tender pasturage or waded in the brooks to cool off, the comedians, accompanied by their wives, hitched up the carryall and drove down to church. The members of the congregation are great admirers of Robson and Crane—who hav lived among them so many years—and are always disposed to extend them such delicate and flattering attentions as a seat in the amen corner, permitting them to act as ushers, to pass the contribution-box, and the like. It so happened that on this particular occasion the worthy deacons who officiated in passing the plates were absent, so the good old pastor from his pulpit kindly asked, 'Won't Brothers Robson and Crane be kind enough to take up the regular missionary offering while Sister Jones p ays a short selection?' The comedians cheerfully stepped from their seats in the cool corner, and passed up the aisles with the round, old-fashioned boxes so common in Eastern houses of worship. Not more than thirty people were in attendance at church that morning, and the contribution was not what it might hav been—in fact, in Mr. Robson's box there were but two nickels and three two-cent pieces, while Mr. Crane's boasted of the trifling sum of two nickels and three one-cent pieces. On being asked to state the amount of the collection, with a far-away look upon his dreamy face, Mr. Crane rose, mechanica ly shook each contribution-box, and replied, in a sort of half-asleep, midnight voice, 'Brother Robson has a pair of fives and three deuces, and the pot's mine, for I've got two fives and three aces.' It took Mr. Crane all one week to explain individually to the horrified congregation how he came to fall so far from grace."

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.
For Freethought societies there is a large card 23 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By Geo. M. Davenport. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

A STUDY OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY

BY LEWIS G. JANES.

This book treats of the natural evolution of the Christian religion, its historical antecedents in Palestinian Judaism and Roman Paganism; investigates the history of the founder of Christianity in the light of the latest scientific criticism of the New Testament; shows that the true story of the Man Jesus, and his genuin teachings are separable from the later legendary accretions which hav confounded him with the mythical Christ, and traces the natural development of Christian dogma and ecclesiastical institutions. MR. CLEVELAND has issued an order that the grounds around the White House shall be closed for a season to the general public, so that the president and family may take their daily exercise without being annoyed by inquisitiv people. The mandate is said to be a mark of delicacy toward Mrs. Cleveland which family men will not fail to appreciate.

CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, the Massachusetts statesman, died Nov. 21st, aged 79. He was the son of John Quincy Adams, sixth president of the United States, and grandson of John Adams, the second president. He is the man who characterized Rutherford B. Hayes as "a person who must forever bear upon his brow the stamp of fraud first triumphant in American history."

Odds and Ends.

A YOUNG lady in this city, who is carrying on a clandestin correspondence with a young man, puts his letters in the family Bible so that her parents will never see them.

"WHO is your favorit author?" asked the literary writer. Maggie quickly replied: "The author of my being, of course, dear papa." It is unnecessary to say that papa immediately came down with the cash for the new dress which Maggie had set her heart on.

ADAM'S life must hav been a happy one. He could go anywhere without having to take a street-car, and could walk block after block with no small boys, boxes of matches, and bone collar-buttons to stop his progress. Many of the gigantic strides made by the world since Adam's time are lamentable failures.

A PASTOR called on a bereaved widow of his congregation the other day, and began consoling her with spiritual texts. Her husband had long been an invalid, and the minister's selections bore on the rest into which he had entered. "Yes," she sighed, "and there is one beautiful verse in the Psalms that applies to me that I think of so much: 'Othello's occupation's gone.'"

WHEN the Tenth Regiment, United States Infantry, was ordered to New Mexico from the "Lake Region," the little son of a captain did not approve of the orders of the general of the army, and, indeed, seriously objected to the change. He had heard much of the dreariness of the wild West, and the Sunday morning before the departure of his father's company said to his parents, "Come, now, let us go to church, and say good-bye to God."

THE PADDY'S OWN PARLIAMENT.

The suggestion of a home parliament for Ireland is certainly very pat.—Mme. De Remusat.

Full soon upon the Irish isle,

A big shillaleh, blown-up daily,
Whooping-gaily parliament.

A high board fence around the coast
They'll build to keep the English out,
With but a gate—or two, at most—
For Yankee gold and papal rout.
A braggadocio parliament,
A mob, begob, old parliament,
A landlord-hustling, rosary-rustling,
Orangeman-bustling parliament.

And whin the premier, mortial grand,
Essays to speak—Hurroo! Hurroo!
The paddy members, passion-fanned,
Will raise the divil's own to do.

And empty claret-bottles
Trimmed up with ribbons blue.

She'll charm you with her tender
Smile and fairy laugh,
And sell you for ten dollars
Some pretty little frivolity of a trinket that she made with her own sweet hands at home at an actual outlay of precisely
One dollar and a half.

THE DEACON'S RESTAURANT.

In Boston is a religious restaurant kept by a deacon. The place is famous for its coffee and cakes, and differs only from the ordinary eating-house in the literature that is spread upon its walls.

Wherever the patron sits he is confronted with a text of scripture in a sort of "God bless our home" frame. It is at once apparent that these texts hav been selected with a view to the fitness of things. They are appropriate to the place and suggest the idea that the proprietor did not wholly lose sight of his business while placing selections from the good book before the eyes of his patrons. Here are a few samples:

"For thus saith the Lord God, the holy one of Israel, in returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietude and confidence shall be your strength."

Immediately underneath this is:

Ham and Beans, 10c.

"He shall feed his flock like a shepherd."

Hot Sausages, 10c.

"If ye be willing and obedient ye shall eat of the fat of the land."

Hot Apple Sauce, 5c.

"Be careful for nothing, but in everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your request be made known unto God."

Coffee and Cakes, 10c.

"The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want."

Oatmeal Mush With Milk, 10c.

"God moves in a mysterious way."

Hash, 10c.

"I will put my law in their inward parts."

Stewed Beef, 5c.

"Say ye to the righteous that it shall be well with them, for they shall eat of the fruit of their doings."

Cakes and Syrup, 10c.

"Behold the lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world."

Cold Roast Mutton, 10c.

of Thought.

his writings, laid down the which the church has been base, and degrade mankind, able the idea of total depravbuild their scheme of salva-

Mr. Longfellow were unbean religion. The essence of an religion is belief in the deity of the Lord Jesus Christ. Without the Godhead of the Christ there is no real Christianity. It is true there is a sort of doctrin which many people fancy to be Christian, and, according to this doctrin, Jesus Christ was not God, but a creature, a man, or a created being somewhat superior to man. But this is not the doctrin of the Christian religion. It is a far-off Christianity. It is a station on the broad road to total unbelief—to Infidelity. This sort of doctrin we understand to hav been the doctrin of Emerson and Longfellow. They were Unitarians, they were not believers in the Christian religion.—New York Sun.

[NOTE.—I don't consider the Sun a great theological authority; but it is mainly in the right as to Emerson and Longfellow. Whether Unitarians are to be called Christians or not is no great matter; "the rose by any other name," etc.; and as long as they take a leading part in all good works, they cannot fail to be respected, let orthodox Christians turn up their noses as they please —Hylax.]

THERE is, in Dr. Tillotson's writings, an argument against the real presence which is as concise and elegant and strong as any argument can possibly be supposed against a doctrin so little worthy of a serious refutation. It is acknowledged on all hands, says that learned prelate, that the authority, either of the scripture or of tradition, is founded merely on the testimony of the apostles, who were eye-witnesses to these miracles of our Savior by which he proved his divine mission. Our evidence, then, for the truth of the Christian religion is less than the evidence for the truth of our senses; because, even in the first authors of our religion, it was no greater, and it is evident it must diminish in passing from them to their disciples, nor can anyone rest such confidence in their testimony as in the immediate object of his senses. But a weaker evidence can never destroy a stronger, and therefore, were the doctrin of the real presence ever so clearly revealed in scripture, it were directly contrary to the rules of just reasoning to giv our assent to it. It contradicts sense, though both scripture and tradition, on which it is supposed to be built, carry not such evidence with them as sense, when they are considered merely as external evidences, and are not brought home to everyone's breast by the immediate operation of the Holy Spirit.—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

THE same word in Hebrew (and Plato thought in Greek also) signifies to "prophesy" and "to be mad," and, even among themselvs, the prophets were often regarded as madmen, an idea to which their frequent habit of going about naked and the performance occasionally of still more disgusting ceremonies, greatly contributed. That many of them were splendid poets and noble-minded men there can be no doubt; but we see in conduct like this little earnest of sobriety or divine inspiration, and far too much that reminds us of the fanatics of Eastern countries and of ancient times. —Greg's Creed of Christendom.

WITH Milton, as with the whole Calvinistic and Puritan Europe, woman was a creature of an inferior and subordinate class. Man was the final cause of God's creation, and woman was there to minister to this nobler being. In his dogmatic treatis, "Concerning Christian Doctrin" (on the first appearance of which Dr. Channing wrote one of his first literary essays, and Macaulay began the brilliant series of articles that gave so great a charm to the Edinburgh Review) Milton formulated this sentiment in the thesis, borrowed from the schoolmen, the soul was communicated in semini patris (in the seed of the father). While Milton adopts the oriental hypothesis of woman for the sake of man, he modifies it by laying more stress upon mutual affection, the charities of home, and the intercommunion of intellectual and moral life, than upon that ministration of woman to the appetite and comforts of man which makes up the whole of her functions in the Puritan apprehension.—Mark Pattison's Milton.

ANOTHER error is an impatience of doubt and haste to assertion without due and mature assertion of judgment. For the two ways of contemplation are not unlike the two ways of action, commonly spoken of by the ancients—the one plain and smooth in the beginning and in the end impassable; the other rough and troublesome in the entrance, but after a while fair and even; so it is in contemplation—if a man will begin with certainties, he shall end in doubts; but, if he will be content to begin with doubts, he shall end in certainties.—Lord Bacon.

MAYOR GRACE told a committee of trades unionists last week that he would, if he could, put a stop to Sunday trading. He said nothing about stopping ministers from carrying on their business on the holy Sabbath.

THE chief of a tribe of Digger Indians worships a stone churn as his god. On first thought you'll say that a dozen missionaries ought to be hurried out there, but wait a minute. This chief neither drinks, swears, steals, nor exibits envy toward his fellow-men. He is said to be moral, honest, and industrious, and was lately swindled out of $30 in a horse trade.—Detroit Free Press.

A SUPERSEDEAS granted in the case of the Chicago Anarchists by Judge Scott givs the condemned men a respit until March, when the application for a new trial will be heard. The Municipal Council of Paris and the Conseil Général of the Seine (France) hav united in asking mercy for these men. Petitions for a new trial may be obtained at the Workingmen's Library, 143 Eighth street, New York.

SAM JONES paused in a discourse on patience at Omaha, Neb., the other night, and said if there was one man present who never had spoken a cross word to his wife, he would ask him to rise. By and by a round-faced, good-natured man stood up. "Thank God," said Sam, "there's one man who never spoke a cross word to his wife!" Everybody took a good look at the paragon, when he broke the silence with the remark: "I havn't any wife. I'm a bachelor."

AN English country clergyman recently told his people that they were largely responsible for the partial failure of their crop, for, on a recent Sunday, when the crops were all ready to be gathered in, they were either in bed or in church, when they should hav been in the harvest field, attending to their duty as farmers. It is plain that this clergyman does not think that going to church on Sunday is at all times a duty.

IN the first seven or eight years of a child's life it will probably be settled whether he is to be swayed by superstition or intelligence; whether he is to liv terrorized by fear or buoyed up by hope and courage. Whoever sends a child into life, permanently anticipating evil, suspicious of everyone in authority, with a disposition to lord it over inferiors by way of making things even, does the child, his associates, and society a wrong so great that no counter-charity can cover it.—Boston Journal of Education.

A LAMA of Thibet thus explains the indifference of his people to the claims of Christianity: "They say that Europeans hav a good religion which they do not generally practice, and yet wish to force on others whose religion is as good and is practiced. The Europeans are believed to be full of greed, for, living in a rich country, they always acquire other countries, and, while they talk of their benevolent purposes, they destroy animal life every day for their own food, thus becoming clouded in calm intellect and in the perception of true morality. They also think their religion, language, and customs the best. If we were to think so of ours it would be considered by us a deviation from the path. Among the nine rules for conduct, we are directed never to suppose much less to say, that our religion is the best, considering that sincere men of other religions are deeply attached to them, and on that account do good to others. All we can do is also to do good, and not to criticise the good of others."

A PROVIDENCE clergyman, while addressing a congregation on the propriety of doing the right things at the right time, said that he was in one of the Northern regiments, and that one day, while on the battle-field, his attention was attracted to a wounded man over whom a young man was bending. He turned to see what the latter was doing, and saw that the man on the ground had been shot through the shoulders, and that one arm was fearfully mutilated. The young man who was kneeling over him was endeavoring to supply religious consolation under difficulties as to extemporaneous effort, and was reading a standard catechism to him. The dying man, as the clergyman reached him, was having the momentous question propounded to him: "Who gave you this name?" —Providence Journal.

SPEAKING of the dangers of emulation, the Rev. J. M. Buckley tells a story to the effect that a young New Jersey preacher, who talked behind a high, old-fashioned pulpit, came to Brooklyn and heard Talmage. He went home convinced that he had learned the secret of this divine's success. During the week he had the antiquated pulpit removed, and a small stand put in its place. On Sunday the deacons noticed the sacrilegious change, and rubbed their eyes incredulously when the preacher began to walk up and down the platform, gesticulating wildly and shouting his climaxes. As one man the deacons rose against him, and he had to put back the old pulpit.

COLONEL INGERSOLL was West last week, and a reporter of the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette quizzed him about his throat troubles. Mr. Ingersoll said: "It is nothing, and will go away. As for stopping smoking and changing my usual habits, that is doctors' nonsense. Grant might as well hav smoked up to the last day of his life, and got the enjoyment of it. An utter and entire change of habits at my time of life or at Grant's is nonsense. It is doctors' nonsense. Some doctors know just as little about physical man as ministers know about the spiritual man, and are just as full of blunders and mistakes, and just as much bound up to old hidebound notions that come down from the dark ages. For hundreds of years physicians bled people because that was the established thing, and physicians before them had done it. Then some Infidel dared to brave obloquy and abuse, and perhaps was burnt at the stake because he believed nature knew more about the matter than man, and furnished blood to make him and to build him up, and that the proper thing was to strengthen the hands of nature by strengthening the blood, instead of destroying the agent by which she wrought her wonders. How many lives do you think hav been sacrificed by the doctors devoted to blood-letting? How many people hav been killed by being refused water when burning to death with fever? There are doctors still practicing in the back districts who think a drink of ice-water will kill a fever patient, when that is all nature requires to keep the patient alive."

Communications.

The Fathers of Our Republic.

Associated with the formation of our republic are four nanes that deserve and will obtain a more enduring fame than others: Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson, George Washington, and Benjamin Franklin.

It was Paine who first proposed American independence, and prepared the public mind for its acceptance. To Jefferson was assigned the task, and to him has been accorded the honor, of formulating the political document whose adoption by the Continental Congress proclaimed our nation's birth. This was followed by a war of revolution, and the central figure, the leader, in this momentous struggle, was Washington. Yet, skilful and sagacious as this commander was, brave and patriotic as his soldiers were, the recognition and assistance of a foreign power was necessary to insure success. This was secured; England's great rival, France, came to the rescue, and the contest was decided in our favor. To the untiring labors of Franklin was this achievement due. Thus these men stand forth—Paine, the Author-Hero; Jefferson, the Statesman-Hero; Washington, the Soldier-Hero; and Franklin, the Diplomatic-Hero, of the Revolution.

Every event in the lives of these illustrious men, every element in their characters, has become a subject of surpassing interest. There is one theme connected with their history upon which I propose to dwell here, and that is the question of their religious beliefs. Few questions are so little understood.

The world has been cursed with two great evils, kingcraft and priestcraft. Kingcraft, in this country, has been destroyed; priestcraft remains—a parasitic army preying upon our body politic. Founded upon fraud, the clerical profession, with many honorable exceptions, depends upon fraud for its support. One of its methods I shall expose in this discourse. While pretending to ignore reason, and intellectuality, and worldly greatness, its members yet realize the importance of having the intellectual Titans and the popular heroes of the world upon their side. "Great men can gain nothing from religion, but religion can gain much from great men," said the theological buzzard that daily perched himself beside the dying Grant. At the same time they realize the humiliating fact that it is for the most part the dwarfs and not the giants of the world that train with them. One of their number, more honest than his fellows, says: "The great, and the wise, and the mighty are not with us. These men, the master minds and imperial leaders among men, are outside our most Christian church." As Saladin observes: "The church would giv ten millions of her blockheads for the adherence and support of one man strong enough to hew his name imperishably upon the mountain of adamant into which are cut the names of the immortals." And thus, recognizing the magic influence that a great name carries with it, the clergy hav inscribed in the Christian roster the names of hundreds who were total disbelievers in their dogmas. As the venders of quack nostrums attach the forged certificates of distinguished individuals to their worthless drugs, to make them sell, so these theological venders present the manufactured indorsements of the great to make their nostrums popular. Jefferson, Washington, and Franklin hav all been denominated Christians, not because they were such, for they were not, but because of the influence that attaches to their names.

Paine's opposition to priestcraft was too pronounced and too well known to claim him as an adherent of their faith, and so they hav sought to destroy his influence by destroying his good name. Not only this, knowing the prejudice that has prevailed against Atheism, they hav misrepresented his theological opinions and declared him an Atheist.

But Paine was not an Atheist, nor were his compeers Christians. They were all Deists, believed in the existence of a God, and in the immortality of the soul, but rejected the fundamental dogmas of Christianity, the inspiration of the scriptures, and the divinity of Christ. The truth of this I shall proceed to establish by indubitable proofs.

PAINE.

"Strong religious minds are not likely to be affected by the Atheism of Paine," recently wrote a Western journalist. Another writer, discussing the authorship of the Declaration of Independence, maintained that Paine could not hav written it, because it acknowledged the existence of a creator. Ask almost any orthodox Christian if Paine believed in a supreme being, and he will tell you that he did not.

Now, could these persons overcome their prejudice so far as to read a single page of Paine's theological writings, they would be ashamed of their ignorance and amazed at the dishonesty of their religious teachers, who are responsible for this ignorance. A more devout believer in God and immortality never lived than Thomas Paine. In no other works that I hav read are the terms God and Creator used more frequently or in a more reverential manner than in his. In his "Age of Reason," the work that brought down upon his devoted head the wrath of the entire Christian priesthood, the recognition of a supreme being is made no less than three hundred times.

I shall now, by reading from this book, refute the charge of Atheism, and demonstrate the Deistic faith of Thomas Paine. On the first page appears his creed:

I believe in one God, and no more; and I hope for happiness beyond this life.

I believe in the equality of man; and I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy.

In summing up his arguments in the first part of this work he says:

The moral duty of man consists in imitating the moral goodness and beneficence of God manifested in the creation toward all his creatures. That seeing, as we daily do, the goodness of God to all men, it is an example calling upon all men to practice the same toward each other; and, consequently, that everything of persecution and revenge between man and man, and everything of cruelty to animals, is a violation of moral duty.

A concluding paragraph of the second part reads as follows:

Were man impressed as fully and as strongly as he ought to be with the belief of a God, his moral life would be regulated by the force of that belief; he would stand in awe of God and of himself, and would not do the thing that could not be concealed from either. . . . This is Deism.

When Paine commenced his "Age of Reason" he was fifty-six. The first great product of his brain, "Common Sense," was written when he was thirty-eight. In this work a Theistic belief is expressed on almost every page. He died at the age of seventy-two. His will begins with these words, "Reposing confidence in my creator, God." It ends as follows: "I hav lived an honest and useful life to mankind; my time has been spent in doing good; and I die in perfect composure and resignation to the will of my creator, God."

Respecting a future existence, he says:

I trouble not myself about the manner of future existence. I content myself with believing, even to positiv conviction, that the power that gave me existence is able to continue it in any form and manner he pleases, either with or without this body (Age of Reason, p. 71).

I consider myself in the hands of my creator, and that he will dispose of me after this life consistently with his justice and goodness (Private Thoughts on a Future State).

Paine was one of the founders and most activ members of the society of Theophilanthropists (lovers of God and Man), which flourished in Paris during and after the French Revolution. Upon their altars was placed this inscription:

We believe in the existence of a God, and in the immortality of the soul.

The fundamental dogmas of the genus religion, God and immortality, Paine accepted; the fundamental doctrins of the species Christianity, the inspiration of the scriptures, and the divinity of Christ, he rejected.

His disbelief in Christianity and kindred creeds is thus expressed:

I do not believe in the creed professed by the Jewish church, by the Roman church, by the Greek church, by the Turkish church, by the Protestant church, nor by any church that I know of. My own mind is my own church (Age of Reason, p. 6).

Who art thou, vain dust and ashes, by whatever name thou art called—whether a king, a bishop, a church, or a state—that obtrudest thine insignificance between the soul of man and his maker? (Rights of Man).

The intellectual part of religion is a private affair between every man and his maker, and in which no third party has any right to interfere. The practical part consists in our doing good to each other. But since religion has been made into a trade, the practical part has been made to consist of ceremonies performed by men called priests. . . . By devices of this kind true religion has been banished, and such means hav been found out to extract money, even from the pockets of the poor, instead of contributing to their relief (Letter to Camille Jordan).

No man ought to make a living by religion. It is dishonest so to do (Ibid).

"All national institutions of churches, whether Jewish, Christian, or Turkish, appear to me no other than human inventions set up to terrify and enslave mankind, and monopolize power and profit (Age of Reason, p. 6).

Each of these churches show certain books, which they call revelation, or the word of God. The Jews say that their word of God was given by God to Moses, face to face; the Christians say that their word of God came by divine inspiration; and the Turks say that their word of God, the Koran, was brought by an angel from heaven. Each of these churches accuse the others of unbelief; and, for my own part, I disbelieve them all (Ibid, 7).

But some perhaps will say, Are we to hav no word of God, no revelation? I answer, Yes: there is a word of God; there is a revelation.

The word of God is the creation we behold. . . . It is only in the creation that all our ideas and conceptions of a word of God can unite. The creation speaketh an universal language, independently of human speech, or human language, multiplied and various as they be. It is an ever-existing original, which every man can read. It cannot be forged; it cannot be counterfeited; it cannot be lost; it cannot be altered; it cannot be suppressed. It does not depend upon the will of man whether it shall be published or not; it publishes itself from one end of the earth to the other. It preaches to all nations and to all worlds; and this word of God reveals to man all that is necessary for man to know of God.

Do we want to contemplate his power? We see it in the unchangeable order by which the incomprehensible whole is governed. Do we want to contemplate his munificence? We see it in the abundance with which he fills the earth. Do we want to contemplate his mercy? We see it in his not withholding that abundance even from the unthankful. In fine, do we want to know what God is? Search not the book called the scripture, which any human hand might make, but the scripture called the creation (Ib., pp. 24, 25).

Of Jesus Christ he writes:

He was a virtuous and an amiable man. The morality that he preached and practiced was of the most benevolent kind (Ib., p. 9).

He was the son of God in like manner that every other person is—for the creator is the father of all (Ib., p. 19).

Thus it will be seen that, while Paine was a disbeliever in the dogmas of Christianity, he was not an Atheist. The most sublime arguments in support of Deism, and against Atheism, ever penned are to be found in his writings. Yet theologians, not by mistake, but intentionally and for a purpose, hav pronounced him an Atheist. And now, knowing how Paine's theological opinions hav been misrepresented, you will be the better prepared to accept the evidence that I shall adduce, showing that what has been taught respecting the religious views of Jefferson, Washington, and Franklin is likewise false.

JEFFERSON.

Could Jefferson's works be suppressed, the clergy might, with less fear of exposure, claim that their author was a Christian. But while his writings are accessible to the public, it adds nothing to their reputation for candor to make the claims respecting his belief which many of them do, for these writings clearly prove that he was a disbeliever.

His "Memoirs and Correspondence," edited by his grandson, was published in 1829. On its appearance the New York Observer, one of the leading Christian journals of this country, gave it the following notice:

Mr. Jefferson, it is well known, was never suspected of being very friendly to orthodox religion, but these volumes prove not only that he was a disbeliever in a divine revelation, but a scoffer of the very lowest class.

What is remarkable, the Observer has never claimed that Jefferson recanted. According to this paper, he was more confirmed in his unbelief than Paine.

In a letter to his nephew and ward, Peter Carr, Jefferson has the following advice to offer, which, though radically sound, would be considered rather questionable advice for a Christian to giv:

Fix Reason firmly in her seat, and call to her tribunal every fact, every opinion. Question with boldness even the existence of a God; because, if there be one, he must more approve the homage of reason than of blindfolded fear. . . . Do not be frightened from this inquiry by any fear of its consequences. If it end in a belief that there is no God, you will find incitements to virtue in the comfort and pleasantness you feel in its exercise and in the love of others which it will procure for you.

The God of the Old Testament—the God which you worship, Christians—Jefferson pronounces "a being of terrific character—cruel, vindictiv, capricious, and unjust" (Jefferson's Works, vol. iv, p. 325).

In speaking of the Jewish priests, he denominates them "a bloodthirsty race, as cruel and remorseless as the being whom they represented as the family God of Abraham, of Isaac, and Jacob, and the local God of Israel" (Ibid).

In his letter of advice to Peter Carr, he thus refers to Jesus Christ:

Keep in your eye the opposit pretensions: First, of those who say he was begotten by God, born of a virgin, suspended and reversed the laws of nature at will, and ascended bodily into heaven; and second, of those who say he was a man of illegitimate birth, of a benevolent heart, enthusiastic mind, who set out without pretensions to divinity, ended in believing them, and was punished capitally for sedition by being gibbeted, according to the Roman law, which punished the first commission of that offense by whipping, and the second by exile or death in furea.

His own opinion respecting the above is expressed in a letter to John Adams, written a short time previous to his death:

The day will come when the mystical generation of Jesus, by the supreme being as his father, in the womb of a virgin, will be classed with the generation of a Minerva in the brain of Jupiter.

In the gospel history of Jesus, Jefferson discovers what he terms "a groundwork of vulgar ignorance, of things impossible, of superstitions, fanaticisms, and fabrications" (Jefferson's Works, vol. iv, p. 325).

He continues: "If we could believe that he [Jesus] really countenanced the follies, the falsehoods, and the charlatanisms which his biographers [Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John] father on him, and admit the misconstructions, interpolations, and theorizations of the fathers of the early, and the fanatics of latter ages, the conclusion would be irresistible by every sound mind that he was an impostor" (Ibid).

Jefferson, however, did not regard Jesus as an impostor. He says:

Among the sayings and discourses imputed to him by his biographers, I find many passages of fine imagination, correct morality, and of the most lovely benevolence; and others, again, of so much ignorance, of so much absurdity, so much untruth and imposture, as to pronounce it impossible that such contradictions should hav proceeded from the same being. I separate, therefore, the gold from the dross, restore to him the former, and leave the latter to the stupidity of some and the roguery of others of his disciples (Works, vol. iv, p. 320).

Of the early Christian evangelists, he writes:

Of this band of dupes and impostors, Paul was the great Corypheus, and first corrupter of the doctrins of Jesus.

For the man Jesus, Jefferson, like Rousseau,

Paine, Ingersoll, and other Infidels, had nothing but admiration; for the Christ Jesus of theology, nothing but contempt.

For nearly sixteen hundred years the doctrin of the Trinity has been a leading tenet of the Christian faith. To doubt this dogma has been the rankest heresy; for denying it thousands hav lost their lives. What Jefferson thought of this doctrin may be gathered from a letter to Colonel Pickering, in which he speaks of "the incomprehensible jargon of the Trinitarian arithmetic, that three are one and one is three."

In a letter to John Adams, dated August 22, 1813, referring to the same subject, he says:

It is too late in the day for men of sincerity to pretend they believe in the Platonic mysticism that three are one and one is three, and yet, that the one is not three, and the three are not one. But this constitutes the craft, the power, and profits of the priests. Sweep away their gossamer fabrics of fictitious religion and they would catch no more flies.

To James Smith he writes:

The hocus-pocus phantasm of a God, like another Cerberus, with one body and three heads, had its birth and growth in the blood of thousands and thousands of martyrs.

His hatred of Calvinism was intense. He denounces the "blasphemous absurdity of the five points of Calvin;" and says that "it would be more pardonable to believe in no God at all than to blaspheme him by the atrocious attributes of Calvin." "It is hard to say," observes Bancroft, "which surpassed the other in boiling hatred of Calvinism, Jefferson or John Adams."

Prayer-meetings and revivals receive the following complimentary notice from his pen:

In our Richmond there is much fanaticism, but chiefly among the women. They hav their night meetings and praying parties, where, attended by their priests, and sometimes by a henpecked husband, they pour forth the effusions of their love to Jesus in terms as amatory and carnal as their modesty would permit to a mere earthly lover (Letter to Dr. Cooper).

In the following significant passage we hav Jefferson's opinion of the Christian religion as a whole:

I hav recently been examining all the known superstitions of the world, and do not find in our particular superstition [Christianity] one redeeming feature. They are all alike, founded upon fables and mythologies (Letter to Dr. Woods).

Could a more emphatic declaration of disbelief in Christianity be framed than this? Nearly every intelligent person who has investigated the subject has doubtless arrived at substantially the same conclusion as Jefferson; yet how few, in the face of popular opinion, hav had the courage to avow it!

In his "Notes on Virginia" the following caustic allusion to Christianity occurs:

Millions of innocent men, women, and children, since the introduction of Christianity, hav been burnt, tortured, fined, and imprisoned; yet we hav not advanced one inch toward uniformity. What has been the effect of coercion? To make one half the world fools and the other half hypocrits.

In the following brave and truthful words we hav his estimate of priestcraft:

In every country and in every age the priest has been hostil to liberty; he is always in alliance with the despot, abetting his abuses in return for protection to his own.

In 1822 he writes:

We hav most unwisely committed to the hierophants of our particular superstition the direction of public opinion—that lord of the universe. We hav given them stated and privileged days to collect and catechise us, opportunities of delivering their oracles to the people in mass, and of molding their minds as wax in the hollow of their hands.

His uncomplimentary allusions to the Christian clergy, to the Christian Sabbath, and to Christianity itself as "our particular superstition" are certainly as unorthodox as anything to be found in Paine.

Jefferson's hatred of priestcraft was lifelong; for while the above was written but a few years prior to his death, the following, from a letter to Mr. Whyte, was written nearly half a century before:

If anybody thinks that kings, nobles, and priests are good conservators of the public happiness, send him here [Paris]. It is the best school in the universe to cure him of that folly. He will see here with his own eyes that these descriptions of men are an abandoned confederacy against the happiness of the mass of the people.

While he detested the entire clergy of whatever denomination, regarding them as a worthless class living like parasites upon the labors of others, his denunciation of the Presbyterian priesthood was particularly severe, as evinced by the following:

The Presbyterian clergy are the loudest, the most intolerant of all sects; the most tyrannical and ambitious, ready at the word of the law-giver, if such a word could now be obtained, to put their torch to the pile, and to rekindle in this virgin hemisphere the flame in which their oracle, Calvin, consumed the poor Servetus, because he could not subscribe to the proposition of Calvin that magistrates hav a right to exterminate all heretics to the Calvinistic creed! They pant to reëstablish by law that holy inquisition which they can now only infuse into public opinion.

Just before his death Jefferson, in a letter to John Adams, made the following declaration respecting his belief:

"I am a Materialist."

In support of his Materialistic creed, he argues as follows:

On the basis of sensation we may erect the fabric of all the certainties we can hav or need. I can conceive thought to be an action of matter or magnetism of loadstone. When he who denies to the creator the power of endowing matter with the mode of motion called thinking shall show how he could endow the sun with the mode of action called attraction, which reins the planets in their orbits, or how an absence of matter can hav a will, and by that will put matter into motion, then the Materialist may be lawfully required to explain the process by which matter exercises the faculty of thinking. When once we quit the basis of sensation is to talk of nothings. To say that the human soul, angels, God, are immaterial, is to say they are nothings, or that there is no God, no angels, no soul. I cannot reason otherwise. But I believe that I am supported in my creed of Materialism by the Lockes, the Tracys, and the Stewarts.

These antichristian views of Jefferson were for the most part written after he had retired to private life; but that the public had always been apprised of his unbelief there can be no doubt. When he ran for president, the more bigoted orthodox journals opposed his election on these grounds. At his inauguration, some of these journals appeared in mourning, while flags were displayed at half-mast, in token of grief because an Infidel had been elevated to the presidency. It is true that Washington and Adams, both disbelievers in evangelical Christianity, had filled the office before him; but they were reticent upon the subject, openly expressing no opinions that would offend the prevailing religious sentiment.

His administration was probably the most purely secular that this country has ever had. During his eight years' incumbency of the office not a single religious proclamation was issued. Referring to his action in this matter, he says, "I know it will giv great offense to the clergy, but the advocate of religious freedom is to expect neither peace nor forgivness from them."

Jefferson's library contained the leading Freethought works of his day. They gave evidence of having been carefully studied, and the marginal annotations from his pen showed that the most radical sentiments were indorsed by him.

He wrote letters to Volney, and placed the bust of Voltaire in his library. He manifested the strongest attachment for Paine, which continued till the latter's death. When Paine signified his intention of returning from France to America, Jefferson furnished a national ship to convey him home. After his return he became the honored guest of the president, both at Washington and Monticello. To Paine and the great English Deist, Bolingbroke, Jefferson paid the following tribute:

You ask my opinion of Lord Bolingbroke and Thomas Paine. They were alike in making bitter enemies of the priests and pharisees of their day. Both were honest men; both advocates for human liberty. These two persons differed remarkably in their style of writing, each leaving a model of what is most perfect in both extremes of the simple and the sublime (Letter to Francis Eppes).

Surely, Christians, your cause must be growing desperate when, to sustain it, you must needs claim for its support so bitter an enemy as Thomas Jefferson—a man who affirmed that he was a Materialist; a man who recognized in your religion only "our particular superstition," a superstition without "one redeeming feature;" a man who divided the Christian world into two classes—hypocrits and fools; a man who asserted that your Bible is a book abounding with "vulgar ignorance;" a man who termed your Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, a "hocus-pocus phantasm; a man who denounced your God as "cruel, vindictiv, and unjust;" a man who intimated that your savior was "a man of illegitimate birth;" a man who declared his disciples, including your oracle, Paul, to be a "band of dupes and impostors," and who characterized your modern priesthood as part of an "abandoned confederacy" against public happiness.

Freethought in England.

VI.—THE FINAL ISSUE.

When Freethought shall hav permeated Protestant Christianity through and through, so that our heresy shall hav become the orthodoxy of the church, we shall then be face to face with our natural and most insidious foe, Roman Catholicism. The Protestant church allows its adherents to exercise their reason, but at present prohibits them by pains and penalties from coming to conclusions contrary to her teachings.

With the growth of intelligence, Protestants will take courage and defy the threats of the priests. The day of reckoning will then be at hand.

Many of the Protestant clergy will, no doubt, seek refuge in the Catholic church, which has always prohibited reason, and which consistently condemns the exercise of it among the laity.

Then will come the tug of war. In England, unhappily, Catholicism at the present time is strong.

It counts among its disciples the aristocratic, who are in league with the priests, and the poor and abject, who subsist upon the charity of the wealthy.

It counts among its leaders men of fine mental qualities, who prefer to starve their intellectual faculties rather than believe unpleasant truths. Such a one is Cardinal Newman. Intellectually he is a giant, but he wastes his splendid talents on an effete religion. Cardinal Manning is a man of a very different order. He has a certain kind of cleverness, but not being able to take a front rank in the English church, he seceded, and by dint of perseverance he has succeeded in gaining a prominent position in the church of Rome.

But no church can stand against the growing Infidelity of the masses.

When the people speak out, the priest will lose his power. Already there are signs of "fear and trembling."

And what will it be when men of science care more for truth than respectability?

Theological dogmas will go to the wind.

There is one fact, however, that should never be forgotten. The strength of the church lies in the number of women who giv it the sanction of their encouragement and support.

Priests know this full well, and while they can cajole the women, they feel sure they are secure.

It is a source of great consolation to me to know that many ladies hav in recent years undertaken to plead the cause of Freethought, and with their assistance a great work is being accomplished. Oh, for a man or woman with the courage to preach the gospel of Freethought to the Irish people! Oh, for the power to free them from the tyranny of the priest! All will come in good time, however, to those who wait, and believers in the doctrin of evolution may be certain of the ultimate triumph of Freethought.

For the churches will be condemned not alone for the falseness of their creeds, but for the shamefulness of their history.

True, they may with one accord proclaim themselvs in favor of liberty when the hour of destruction arrives; but shall we not be able to refer to the days of their strength for testimony against them? Shall we not be able to point to the Dark Ages of Christianity, when the Catholic church had full power; to the brutal murder of Bruno at Rome, where today stands a statue of the immortal Freethinker, to act as a perpetual reminder to the priests of their horrible deeds?

Shall we not be able to tell the story of Galileo's sufferings; and recount the agony of those brave spirits who were defiant in the sight of the dungeon, the rack, and the stake?

And will they listen undisturbed to the horrors of the Inquisition, and the insidious crimes perpetrated against humanity in Spain and France—aye, and even in England when their church was a real power?

Fortunately, the Catholic church cannot repudiate her history, and if she dared, it would only the more assuredly seal her doom.

When men's minds are perfectly free they will judge of the history of this church, and condemnation must follow, as certainly as night follows day. Freethinkers ask not for vengeance; they plead for justice. They know that suffering in the past was the necessary condition of progress, but in the future they will strive to win greater progress with less pain to struggling humanity. Thus Freethought will become the true savior of mankind. And whereas all religions hav provoked envy, hatred, malice, and warfare among the peoples of the earth, Freethought will weld mankind together into one great force that shall unceasingly work for the highest attainable good of the largest number of the human family.

The poorest, the humblest, as well as the richest and most powerful—all alike can work for this noble object, and he who, with the enthusiasm begotten of a great truth, devotes his life to service in such a cause, will find his reward in the increased happiness and prosperity of his fellows.

Our duty is not service to the infinit being who theologians declare rules over the universe, but to our fellow-man, and if there were a God of goodness existing somewhere in the infinit expanse, methinks that he would be more likely to approve than condemn our actions.

Let me conclude by illustrating this by the admirable poem of Leigh Hunt:

Abou Ben Adhem—may his tribe increase!—
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw amid the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold;
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the vision in the room he said,
"What writest thou?" The vision raised its head,
And with a voice made of all sweet accord,
Replied, "The names of them that love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said, "I pray thee, then,
Write me as one who loves his fellow-men."

The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
He came again, with a great wakening light;
He showed the names whom love of God had blest,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

London, Eng. ARTHUR B. MOSS.

GOVERNOR CURRIER of New Hampshire deserves honorable mention. His Thanksgiving proclamation contained no allusion to any deity, and some of the Puritans refused to observe the day on that account

Thanksgiving Charities.

This morning many of the worthy poor of the city received the wherewith to make Thanksgiving what it should be—a day of thanks for bounties received, at the distribution of the "Thanksgiving dinner charity," at 7½ Beacon street.

The people began to come before 10 o'clock, and from that time there was a steady stream until the supply was exhausted. The line reached out on the sidewalk and up Beacon street to Somerset street. It was interesting to see the class of people who came. They were, as a rule, neatly clothed, and had none of the ragged assumption of poverty which would mark the fraudulent poor.

In all about 1,200 families, representing over 5,000 people, were provided for by this society, as well as twelve public institutions. There were four tons of turkeys and six tons of groceries given out. The funds which enabled the society to make the distribution were over $5,000, contributed by the Sunday-schools throughout New England and by charitable individuals.

The above, clipped from the Boston Globe, Thanksgiving morning, is a satire on our boasted civilization. In this land of plenty—in Boston, too, with its wealth and culture—1,200 heads of families, 5,000 persons, are so far tortured by want and misery that they will accept one day's feasting at the hand of charity! I don't wish to belittle the worthy efforts of those engaged in this work of charity, but what of these families in the long, cold, and severe winter that is now upon us? One day's supply will not suffice for months to come. What of want and misery is foretold by these few lines—what of the envy, hate, and crime fostered by the conditions which surround these 1,200 families!

It may be alleged that it is through laziness and dissipated habits that all this comes, but much is enforced idleness. A lady in this city informs me that she advertised for a servant, and before 11 A.M. seventy-four persons had applied. In the month of July I advertised for an engineer in the morning paper, and on my arrival at the office at 7:30 A.M., less than two hours after the issue of the paper in the early morning, eight applicants awaited me, and before 10 A.M. I had received fifty-three applications, and it continued all day; but I lost count, and each mail was freighted with applications. These incidents would indicate enforced idleness, and they might be multiplied indefinitly. Only three days ago an intelligent and evidently well-educated man applied to me for employ as a machinist, a common occurrence, repeated many times each day. When he received a negativ reply, he dropped into a chair, saying: "For God's sake giv me something to do. I hav a wife and three children, one child sick, and nothing to eat in the house since yesterday. I hav traveled for three weeks earnestly seeking work, and I am willing to do anything for any price to save my starving family!" All up and down our fair land goes the cry of want, and this with granaries overflowing with the products of the soil. The cunning devices of the ingenuity of man hav changed the whole system of social economy, and this problem of the more equal distribution of the products of soil and handicraft requires more than the distribution of a few tons of turkeys and groceries on Thanksgiving.

Our broad country possesses almost every variety of climate, and produces almost everything required by the necessities or comfort of the human family, abundantly sufficient for 400,000,000, and yet, with less than 60,000,000, haggard want looks into the doors of nearly one-half of this limited number. Verily the land question is of vast importance, and the sixty-thousand votes of New York for Henry George carry with them a significance not to be misunderstood. Shall the sordid selfishness and greed blind the more fortunate to the dangerous elements engendered in our body politic by the ever-widening gulf that yawns between the rich and poor? Sagacity and wisdom will be sorely needed to avert the calamity that will surely come unless some more efficacious remedy is applied than Thanksgiving turkeys and free soup. HENRY S. BACON.

Boston, Nov. 26, 1886.

Thomas Jefferson's Grave.

Colonel Wilson, of the army, who has charge of the monument recently erected by order of Congress over the grave of Thomas Jefferson at Monticello, says that the vandals are already at work chipping chunks off the stone, and that if it is to be preserved a military guard will hav to be sent down there. Several years ago Congress appropriated $5,000 for the purpose of restoring the cemetery in which Jefferson is buried, and erecting a new monument over his grave. This was in the time of Hayes, and the appropriation was not to be available until the owners of the estate gave a quit-claim to the United States of a tract of ground two rods square surrounding the burial place, and a pathway by which access thereto might be afforded the public. Jefferson was buried at Monticello in a little cemetery on his own plantation, and his wife, other members of his family, and some of his old servants lie beside him. When the estate was being laid out at the time he was president, Jefferson wrote to his overseer instructing him to set apart a little plot of ground as a burial place. "Choose some unfrequented vale in the park," he said, "where there is no sound to break the stillness but the babbling of a brook that winds among the woods, where no mark of human shape is, unless it be the skeleton of some poor wretch who sought out the spot to despair and die in. Let it be among the venerable oaks. Intersperse some gloomy evergreens. Appropriate one-half of it for my family and the rest for my servants and strangers who may die in the neighborhood. Let the exit look upon the Blue Mountains."

The first stone that was erected over Jefferson's grave was an exact copy of a diagram he left, and the epitaph was as he wrote it. It was chipped to pieces by relic hunters. A second one, and a fac-simile, was substituted in 1851 of the same material, which he thought no one would be tempted to destroy because of its value, but during the war the soldiers camped in that neighborhood carried it off by piecemeal, until nothing was left but a sandstone stump. The wall around the little cemetery was destroyed, and the whole plantation was in a state of dilapidation. Then Congress ordered it to be restored, and, although the bill passed in 1878, it was not until 1885 that the secretary of state was able to get a title to the cemetery. The secretary, with more of an eye to the artistic than a wish to comply with his famous predecessor's instructions, repudiated Mr. Jefferson's model and material, and instead of a shaft six feet high of the sandstone found on the place, has given him a shaft eighteen feet high of granit. The work was only recently finished, and Colonel Wilson, who went down to inspect it, has made a report to the secretary of state in which he recommends that some means be taken to protect it from the vandals, who hav already been at work and hav ruined the monument by chipping off large chunks from the corners. The colonel says the iron fence is a sufficient protection against grown people, for the gate is kept locked, but small boys squeeze through between the iron pickets, and with hammers and hatchets hack the corners off and sell them as relics to visitors. He says the agent at the railway station told him that only the day before he arrived two well-dressed ladies appeared with large pieces of the stone, which they said they had hired a boy to chop off for them. The way to circumvent the vandals is to hire men to stay on the place and watch all who come.—Sun.

The Mission Fraud.

From the Brooklyn Eagle.

An officer attached to the man-of-war Monocacy, which is now in China, writes the following letter to a friend in this city:

"CANTON, Aug. 1, 1886.

"There is in Canton a hospital, managed at present by one Dr. Kerr, for the purpose of doing a sort of missionary surgery among the Chinese, but supported by foreigners, and one of the cardinal regulations being that all foreigners applying for treatment shall be received. The hospital has been in existence for about fifty years, and one knowing China can easily imagin how many persons of our nationality hav received any benefit from it. Some little time since we had a man dangerously ill with rheumatic fever, so ill, in fact, that Dr. Craig had serious fears for the result, and as he was too weak to be sent to Hong Kong or Yokohama, the doctor suggested that he go to the hospital here. This was acceded to, of course, and the doctor was to make arrangements for paying all the expenses of treatment, attendance, food, etc. Dr. Craig went down to the hospital, supposing it would only be a matter of very simple arrangement, and that we could send the man at once. Our chief idea was, of course, to send our man where he could be quiet and cooler than on our berth deck with a temperature of ninety degrees Fahr. At the very outset Dr. Craig was met with objections; the hospital was already crowded; there were no hospital attendants, the friends of the patients attending to them usually; there was no bedding for patients, and, finally, there was no means of providing food for foreign patients. After considerable talk, Craig stating our intention of sending an ample supply of bedding from the ship and our apothecary and sick nurse, he was shown a miserable little dog-hole in rear among Chinese hovels, hot and foul-smelling, and was told that was the best that could be done in the way of accommodations.

"On the question of food, however, they seemed—I mean the surgeons in charge—to be able to do nothing. When Craig suggested that the small amount of food necessary for a man with a high fever might be cooked by the same means that their mess was supplied, one small missionary doctor positivly objected to any such arrangement, saying that the lady doctor who had charge of the housekeeping affairs was already 'overworked.' Overworked; for one who knows something of the way these 'holy Joes' work in China can understand what that means. Dr. Craig came back and reported, and was told to write and tell the hospital people that we would not trouble them in any way, and that we would not send a yellow dog into such quarters as they proposed to put an American man-of-war's man. I suppose you remember the story of the 'few bricks that were left and how they were used?' Well, in this case, the few bricks were used to build a large, airy-looking house on the river in front of the hospital, which is not seen, being among the Chinese houses. Now, take these two pictures—the great big cool house on the river front, built to get the breeze, with only three or four people living in it, and having, oh! such a hard time doing good to the heathen—the dear, blessed heathen—and the Monocacy, with nearly 150 people on board her in midsummer at this place, where we are stationed principally for the purpose of preventing the Chinese from cutting the throats of these same people, who hav so much to do that they cannot even hav food prepared for one of the crew of this ship, who is dangerously ill. It is enough to make one's blood boil, and to make him swear at all the canting, whining hypocrits engaged in so-called missionary work among the Chinese. Why cannot some one come out and tell the truth about the whole fraud in such a way as to reach our people and induce them to storm the beggars out? It would be a righteous crusade for some paper to engage in, as worthy as the breaking up of other rings. The man is still very ill, and the doctor fears cannot recover, but we hav done all we can for him on board ship. The pilot-house has been cleared out, and turned into a sick bay for him. We keep the ship as quiet as possible, even omitting some of the drills."

An Eagle reporter showed the above letter to several naval officers to-day. They said they know the hospital very well, and were pleased to know that its methods were about to be exposed to the American people. Its rules stated that it was for the reception of foreigners, yet its doors were often shut against the sick and dying mariners.

The American Secular Union.—Reports.

At four meetings of the Board of Directors of the American Secular Union Nov. 16th, 23d, 28th, and 29th, at which were present Charles Eckhard, Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., E. M. Macdonald, and S. P. Putnam, the following business was transacted:

Charles Eckhard was chosen chairman of the meeting.

The report of the Auditing Committee appointed for the examination of the treasurer's and secretary's report of the finances was presented and adopted by the Board.

Samuel P. Putnam, the secretary, stated to the Board of Directors that in order to make the work of the Union in the future untrammeled by debt, he would forego his claim to the $618.14 due for services as secretary to Nov., 1886, as allowed by report of Auditing Committee.

Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., presented the following, which was adopted:

At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the American Secular Union, held in the city of New York, Nov. 28, 1886, a careful hearing was given to the report of the secretary, Mr. Putnam, concerning his work during the past year, and to the treasurer's statement of the financial condition of the Union. Inasmuch as the society did not enter upon its work a year ago free from debt, owing to certain obligations incurred during previous administrations, it has not been possible from the receipts of the past year to clear up all outstanding accounts, and pay the secretary the whole amount of salary which had been voted to him; but since the secretary, in his unbounded enthusiasm for the interests and purposes of the society, feels disposed to forgiv this delinquency, and as the other deficit is comparativly small, there is every reason to feel encouraged with the status and progress of the movement, and to arrange for a continuance of the practical propaganda during the next year on about the same basis as that of the last. It is the opinion of the present Board of Directors that the policy of "pay as you go" should be strictly adhered to, but feeling confident that the sentiment of the members of the American Secular Union is, by a large majority, in favor of maintaining this activ propagandism, and that their generosity may be depended upon to furnish the sinews of war for another vigorous campaign, the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That on behalf of the American Secular Union, we express a hearty vote of thanks to our retiring president, Col. R. G. Ingersoll, for aid and counsel, for his liberality both directly and indirectly in the payment of expenses, for the advantage of his influence and a name which is at all times a tower of strength.

Resolved, That we acknowledge with thanks the aid which Liberals all over the United States hav given, either in direct subscriptions, or by contributions of time, work, or hospitalities.

Resolved, That we recognize in Mr. S. P. Putnam an efficient secretary, and a man of unusual fitness for missionary work in the way of planting the seeds of Secularism in distant fields, hitherto unplowed with Liberal thought; that in so doing he is preparing the way for other Freethought lecturers to find profitable fields of employment; thas his services are fully worth the sum of $1,500 per year as voted at the Cassadaga Congress; and, therefore, let it be further

Resolved, That we again appeal to the generous impulses, the public spirit, and the humanitarian zeal of the Liberal public to raise a fund for the coming year which shall make it possible to carry forward promptly and energetically this and other important work, and in so doing to adhere to the principle that the "laborer is worthy of his hire."

DR. E. B. FOOTE, JR.,
CHAS. ECKHARD,
E. M. MACDONALD.

It was voted to pay out of the funds now in the treasury the sum of $50 to D. A. Blodgett, and that the remaining $100 due him, and $25 due C. Edelheim, should be paid at the earliest possible opportunity.

This will leave the Union free from debt, and all contributions will then be for its future work.

The directors wish to call attention to the following points:

1. Under the arrangements made at Cassadaga to hav two paid officers in the field, the Union, for the first year, was unable to meet its obligations, and at the last Congress was in debt for salary to the extent of $825.

2. With the policy of having but one salaried officer in the field, the Union has more than paid its way for the past year, and but for the deficit of the previous year, the balance would be in favor of the treasury instead of against it.

3. The relinquishment by the secretary of the sum due him for salary now leaves the Union nearly free from debt, and with the experience of the past two years for a guide, and the generous devotion of friends, the coming year will, no doubt, be far more successful, both in the work achieved and in its pecuniary results.

The resignation of E. M. Macdonald, which was offered at the first meeting of the board, November 16th, was accepted, and E. A. Stevens was elected to fill the vacancy. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.
CHAS. ECKHARD, Chairman.

Bigotry.

The admitted truism that "one who cannot reason is a fool; one who dare not is a coward; one who will not is a bigot," is fully exemplified in our everyday walks in life. Of all these three conditions of the human mind, perhaps the most dangerous and repulsiv is that of bigotry, as it seems with its silent doggedness to imply the conditions of the two first.

The Materialist wonders that men strongly religious, men strongly educated in the hope of immortality in some form of Christian faith, refuse to launch in controversy with them on the frigid sea of annihilation at death.

There is no term more misapplied than bigotry. The assumed Liberalist is apt to be very free in applying it to all religious zealots, little thinking that he or she, perhaps, is equally as great an offender.

If Materialists would only condescend to examin Spiritualism from a scientific standpoint, we are certain they would find the subject less repulsiv and wonderfully interesting. All religions, Catholic and Protestant, early gave Spiritualism the cold shoulder, and for why?—inasmuch as its teachings favored no particular religious creed, but, on the contrary, they considered it only another subtil effort of the "evil one" to entrap souls, hence to be avoided, and the bellowing for salvation should increase.

It is difficult to determin what are the absolute natural instincts or proclivities of the human mind; so much depends upon the early bias of education. Thus a child reared amid the surroundings of Materialism should excite no more surprise that it grows up a skeptic or Atheist than that another reared among the emotional believers in Methodism should develop as a full-grown hell-fearing Methodist. To the philanthropist that faith is best which tends to the greatest happiness to humanity. Hence it becomes all Rationalists to be ever guarded against bigotry. D. BRUCE.

Brooklyn, E. D.

AT the annual meeting of the Woman's Suffrage Association held recently in Manchester, England, it was reported that three hundred and forty-one members of the House of Commons are in favor of woman suffrage. Mr. Bradlaugh, however, has some doubt whether the whole of the three hundred and forty-one are quite earnest in the desire to see all women hav votes in parliamentary elections, Mixed Pickles.

The Lord has pulled in another recruit of the regulation pattern. Groblewski (Phœbus! what a name!), the alleged Brooklyn wife-poisoner, has gone back on the devil and come out for the Lord. All he wants now is to come out of prison. The parsons and pietists will see to it that he comes out, with the help of the Lord, of course.

The Cayuga (N. Y.) Chief, giving "taffy on a stick" to the World, says, among other things, that "the time will come when money kings and corporation lords will be brought to book." Yes, Chief, that time will come, but please take notice that the World is not "going for" "corporation lords and money kings" to any great extent, the editor thereof being a "corporation lord" unto himself, and a "money king" of no mean proportions, and hoping to grow bigger. He is not going to hunt himself to cover.

And so the Anarchists are to hav a respit, preliminary to a new trial. This is well. The bloodiest murderers are granted new trials, if convicted, even to the number of six or seven, sometimes, and why should not these men, tried for a penal crime and convicted for a political one—tried and convicted when governmental bosses had lost their heads, and the press was foaming at the mouth, tried and convicted in an hour when blood was in the hearts of all officials, including judges, and on the moon—why should they not hav a new trial? This country has enough to answer for without committing judicial murder. A new trial in a moment of calmness will acquit them, as it should.

The World was dreadfully afraid that the "foundations of society would be subverted" by the George movement. And this "society" the World so trembles for, what is it? A putrescence—a thing rotten from center to circumference, from church-altar to drawing-room! What are its "foundations?" First, wealth, inherited—even from a pirate—crookedly made in business, or stolen outright by those in positions of trust; but wealth, by all means. Second, aristocracy, old line or new—descent from Dutch grocers ("blue blood"), or present day shoddyites (very ordinary blood). Third, snobbery of all degrees, with or without brains, but principally without. Fourth, grabocracy—the devil take the hindmost. Fifth, office-holding, with consequent official corruption. Sixth, fashion, with its follies flaunting in the faces of famishing millions. Seventh, wrong and oppression in every shape against the masses. Eighth, politics of the old rut order. Ninth, hypocrisy in every form. Tenth, falsity in general—falsum in uno, falsum in omni! Of such are the "foundations" of present day "society" in the land of the "free," and the quicker they are "subverted" the better. Pull out one of these "sample bricks," and the fabric of "society" would totter to its fall.

Talmage, on Thanksgiving day—a great humbug, this day, by the way—had his curriculum interiorly decorated with all sorts of garden and field truck—what a master of claptrap he is!—such as pumpkins, potatoes, corn-stalks, squashes, apples, big beets—himself the biggest beat—cauliflowers, carrots, rhubarb or pie plant, cabbage heads—very appropriate—etc., etc., until it looked like a section of a country fair. In what room was left on the platform, or stage, where he performs his grotesquery, Talmage pranced about like a prize chimpanzee, begging pardon of the latter-named specimen of "creation" as being in every way, to the eye, an animal superior to the Brooklyn blatherskite, and never drew heartier laughter from a highly amused crowd than he did on the day mentioned. He wagged his jaw for an hour, vaporing as usual, when the crowd was dismissed, sorry, no doubt, that the grotesque farce was over. Many people wonder how he can draw the crowds he does. Nothing to be wondered at. A first-class clown—I admit he is first-class—will always draw crowds, when deserving artists appear to empty benches. Said a lady, who attended his clown and cabbage-head entertainment, to the writer: "It was better than a circus or any negro minstrel show. I don't know what to make of that man Talmage. He is either 'cracked' or a natural-born clown!" As the latter she hit the Brooklyn "freak" just where he livs—he is a "natural-born clown!" And he clowns it at the rate of $15,000 a year, more or less, but not much, if any, less. Great are the opportunities of a clown, if he doesn't let them slip; and the Brooklyn clown, the clown par eminence of the country, doesn't let them slip. SI SLOKUM.

THE women of Wisconsin are hereafter to vote upon school affairs. This amendment was carried at the recent election by a majority of 4,543. Thus, quietly but surely, does the world move along, and woman will be more womanly when man recognizes her equal individuality and woman dares assume the high prerogativs which this recognition involves.—Unity.

The Decay of Christian Morality.

II.

The man that took the life of Jesus for a model would hate father and mother, brother and sister; he would hav neither wife nor child, he would liv from place to place, he would be a law-breaker and an idler, he would liv the life of a wanderer and die the death of a criminal. Hav I put a false color in this picture I hav painted? Hav I misrepresented the life of Jesus? Read the four gospels and see. I find this character sketched in the New Testament, and it is there called Jesus, and it is this character which we are adjured to imitate if we would be perfect. To the man or woman who declares that the life of Jesus is the way to salvation, I hav only to say, Why then do you not imitate it?

Now, I wish to ask, what kind of morals would such a man as we hav sketched naturally teach? You will answer, The morals he lived. At least, we find such morals taught in the New Testament. My point here is, If the life of Jesus was an honest, faithful exponent of his moral teachings, then such a morality as he practiced is not wanted to-day; and that such a morality is not wanted is shown by the fact that no one practices it. I know that it is considered respectable and pious to profess great admiration for the doctrins taught by Jesus, and the world has paid them the outward compliment of profession, saying that the moral code of the New Testament was the despair of man; but it has never seriously set to work to reduce this code to practice, which proves that such profession is only a part of the universal accomplishment of fashionable hypocrisy.

Do not understand me as saying that there is no moral precept contained in the gospels that is worthy of being practiced. I make no such declaration, and wish no such construction put upon my words. What I desire to enforce is this, that the morality of Jesus sprung from a philosophy that has passed away, and, therefore, that is for the greater part obsolete and worthless. That Jesus shared the general belief of his age that the world was soon to be destroyed is shown by his estimate of earthly things; and that a morality founded upon such a belief should survive and outlast the faith that inspired it reveals a condition of things that is not flattering to our intellectual perception or to our moral sense.

The morals of the New Testament are founded upon a theory of the universe that is found now only in creeds—those epitaphs of religion.

The most superficial observation is sufficient to enable us to perceive that theology cannot longer be the basis of morality, and that the authority of the New Testament cannot be accepted on this question. There is nothing more firmly impressed upon the mind of man than the fact of the stability of the universe, notwithstanding the recent earthquakes in South Carolina; and the value of earthly things has a higher moral estimation consequent upon the assurance of material existence. Morality must hav a physical basis—that is, the moral code that man can practice to his safety and his honor must not contradict human nature. The defeat of the New Testament morals is assured by their antagonism to the nature of man. The morality of Jesus was designed to fit man for what he called the kingdom of heaven, but the only morality that is worth the name is that which fits man for human life on earth. Jesus constantly urged men to the performance of moral duties that they might be rewarded by their father in heaven. Such a motiv for good behavior is offensiv to the rational mind, and moral commandments that are enforced with a heaven and a hell do not spring from a knowledge of the world that deserves our respect.

The most comprehensiv criticism that one can make upon the morals of the New Testament is that they are not practical.

Is the character of Christians fashioned by the power and influence of the words that Jesus left in the world? This question should be pressed to an answer, and honesty would answer it in a way that would shake every church building in the land and tear the mask from the face of every Christian worshiper on the globe.

Jesus taught that men and women were to love him more than father or mother, son or daughter. Imagin human beings loving a man that they know nothing about, care nothing about, and who has no more claim to their affections than has the ghost in "Hamlet." Such morality as this is not fit for a Hottentot. If any command is implanted in our nature, and is a part of the bone and fiber of our very being, it is to love, beyond all else, those who hav borne us and cared for us through infancy and childhood, and those whose existence depends upon us, and to whom we stand pledged by the holiest ties of our beings, to watch over and protect, to care for and love to the last days of our life. It is love of parent and child that is alike the supreme obligation and the supreme benefaction to humanity.

No being has walked this earth who has the moral right to demand a greater love than is due to father and mother, son and daughter, and if Jesus claimed such affection his claim is an impertinence which we are bound to treat with indignation and scorn. For the Christian church to make the words of Jesus a command to the world is to deserve the severest condemnation. Jesus taught that men were not to make for themselvs a home, not to cultivate those virtues that blossom into the family, and not to save the fruits of their toil to make old age, with its tottering form and feeble sight, less liable to the hardships of the world, but he summed up all the duties of life in these words, "Sell what thou hast and giv to the poor, and come and follow me." To obey such teaching as this would overturn every monument of prosperity upon the earth, blight every feeling of happiness that gladdens the heart of man, and convert the busy work-loving world into one vast army of tramps, following a king without a kingdom, a leader without a purpose, a commander with nothing to giv those who followed his command.

Jesus taught that we were not to resist evil; that is, that if a thief stole our watch and chain we were bound to run after him and giv him our purse also; that if a man took away our coat we should wrong him if we did not send him the balance of the suit; that if a man struck us on one cheek we were to invite him to strike the other also; that if, as it were, the armies of some foreign power were to invade our land and burn and destroy our cities and towns, pillage our homes and murder our families, we were in duty bound to look upon them as benefactors and thank them for their work of destruction, and ask them to come and do it again. Such moral teaching as this would make a nation of cowards and slaves. It is our duty to punish thieves and robbers, not reward them; to resist wrong and injustice, not to submit to them like cravens; to protect our country from foes, even though we are obliged to shed their blood and our own. Is there a Christian on the globe who pays the least heed to a single one of these moral commands of Jesus? You all know there is not. I need not tell the Christian church that the morality taught by Jesus is decaying, when every church is its coffin and every minister its grave-digger. If you wish too see how much respect for the moral teaching of Jesus one of his professed followers has, steal his coat, and if he givs you his cloak also, please publish his name in the daily papers for the benefit of others who wish to get a cloak.

We find among the express commands of Jesus this advice: "Lay not up for yourselvs treasures upon earth." The most liberal translation of this counsel cannot make it anything but poor advice. Every material blessing of mankind has come from the savings of human labor, and the wisdom of laying up treasures upon earth is more evident than that of laying up "treasures in heaven," whatever this saying may mean.

When every Christian tries as hard to be poor as he tries now to get rich, we shall think that he has some regard for the moral teachings of Jesus. It must be apparent to all that what may be claimed as Christian morality is not only decaying, but that it ought to decay. There is no sense in it. Imagin a man telling people in the nineteenth century to "take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body what ye shall put on," and endeavoring to prove that because the fowls of the air do not hav to broil a beefsteak for their breakfast or make biscuits for tea, human beings will be fed whether they provide anything for their tables or not. Jesus tells us that our heavenly father will feed us because we are better than the fowls of the air; and that he will clothe us because he clothes the grass of the field. Our earthly fathers seem to hav done more for us in the way of feeding and clothing us before we were able to take care of ourselvs than any heavenly father.

Others may put their trust in God for something to eat and drink and wear if they wish to, but I prefer to giv the subject a little more thought myself.

Jesus concludes these admonitions by saying, "Take no thought for the morrow." This is bad counsel, and it shows the good sense of mankind that it has never been followed.

The whole world livs in what one of our poets calls "The bright to-morrow of the mind." We will refer to only one more of the peculiar moral injunctions of Jesus. In the fifth chapter of Matthew, in the forty-fourth verse, we read: "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you." If we were to do as herein commanded, we should hav an inverted morality which would place the crown of virtue upon the forehead of vice. Let us see if the preacher of this doctrin practiced it. Did Jesus bless the scribes and Pharisees when they refused to acknowledge his claim to be the son of God?

This is the blessing he pronounced upon them: "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrits, for ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretense make long prayers; therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation." "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell!" That is not a very sweet blessing. And these men did not curse Jesus—they only did not agree with his opinions.

Jesus also, in his wrath against his enemies, calls them, in the seventeenth and nineteenth verses of the twenty-third chapter of Matthew, "Ye fools and blind," forgetting, doubtless, that he had previously declared, when preaching on the mount, "Whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire."

The moral teachings of Jesus were inspired by a false estimate of all earthly things. There is no doubt but that he believed that the world was coming to an end in his generation. How to get into the kingdom of heaven was of more consequence than how to reform mankind, or improve the world, since the end of earthly things was near at hand. This appears to hav been the thought of Jesus, and explains much of his language.

But to-day we do not believe that the earth has run his course, and that the end of all material things is near at hand. We are living without fear of failure on the part of the universe, and are giving our attention more to human wants than to divine commands. Not fear of offending God, but fear of wronging man, is the highest basis of morals.

We hav reached a time when apologies are not respected, when repentance is looked upon as the mask of villainy, when the stature of life is most shorn of manliness by prancing in the garb of humility, when a brave facing of life's trials and demands counts for more than cowardly surrender in the name of God. In fact, we hav come to say to the world of humanity, Be moral, and let your morality be your religion. But we want no cheap moral duties held up for man to perform. It is serious business to liv this life of ours and liv it well, and it is hard work to do it. Morality sets us as high a task as we are able to perform, and a higher task than has yet been performed by most of mankind. The effort of this age is to expose the sham of what is called holiness, and make sacred the surroundings of human beings. We must throw off the past, and stand upon that sunlit hight where we can feel that "somehow life is bigger after all than any painted angel, could we see the man that is within us." This is the moral duty of the world, to respect the man that is within us.

We ought to rear on the earth a range of moral Alps that would stand and command the admiration of the world as long as eye could see and heart could feel. We need a rational hope and a burning purpose in this century, something noble to liv for, and the courage of nobility to work and win it. The improvement of the world is the only object of life worthy of man. Do and say nothing that will not improve mankind. Were this simple admonition heeded, we should hav the key to the kingdom of the only heaven that man needs in our own pocket.

It is time for the reign of common-sense to begin on earth; time for men to elevate religion above theology, and time for us to say, Millions for the world; not a cent for the church. The battle between freedom and Christianity has begun, and I believe that when it ends Christianity will be buried beneath the ruins of its own dogmas, there to remain forever.

It possesses no spirit that can rise again from its ashes, and mount on wings of flame to a higher life. When superstition dies it dies to the root. The Christian minister cannot arrest the march of liberty by crying Infidelity, and threatening with everlasting cremation all those who refuse to heed his words. But let there be no base understanding of freedom. The New John the Baptist must not be a cowboy, saying, "The kingdom of highwaymen is at hand." As a person, when in perfect bodily health, knows not from any intimation from the respectiv parts that he has a stomach, a brain, or a heart, so a person, when living in perfect freedom, is unconscious of law, of creed, of custom. The healthy man physically is the free man physically; the healthy man mentally is the free man mentally; the healthy man morally is the free man morally. Liberty of the individual is the health of the individual, and a free man means a man who is true and obedient to all natural laws.

There is a misunderstanding of freedom upon the one side, and a misrepresentation of it on the other, that makes it hazardous for one to employ the word. To connect this word with religion, in the eyes of many, is to confound the Madonna with Mary Magdalene. It is to start the ghost of Judas Iscariot. The conservatism of society has ever regarded liberty as the black flag of the moral marauder, the emblem of a piratical intention upon the casket of the world that contains honor, justice, virtue, and social order. So persistently and malignantly has freedom been represented as a wrecker's light, kindled only to lure to destruction, that to represent it as worthy to be trusted is to arouse the spirit that pursued Voltaire to his grave with a lie, erected a shaft of calumny over the tomb of Paine, and that attacks the living, who refuse to acknowledge that the voice of the church is the voice of God, with the coward's weapon of slander. But, nevertheless, we believe, with Burns, that

> Upo' this tree there grows sic fruit
> Its virtues a' can tell, man;
> It raises man aboon the brute,

It makes him ken himsel', man.
Gif ance the peasant taste a bit
He's greater than a lord, man,
And wi' the beggar shares a mite
Of a' he can afford, man.

And so we exclaim, in the words of one of our own true poets:

Always in thine eyes, O Liberty!
Shines that high light whereby the world is saved,
And though thou slay us we will trust in thee.

You hav all heard of the man who refused to open his eyes for a year, and who declared that during that time nothing could be seen on account of the darkness. But the endeavor to perpetuate old errors by keeping the eyes closed to the facts of science, the truths of philosophy, and the progress of the human race has not been crowned with success.

The further attempt to convert the world to what James Parton calls a "kitchen religion" is merely waste of power.

The preaching of Christianity is making "much ado about nothing." What we want is manhood.

It is said by the church that the man who livs for his family, and brings all that he can win of what is fair and bright and glad to those he loves may be a good man, but he is not a Christian, and therefore has no religion. Giv me, then, the man who is not a Christian and who has no religion, for if the man who loves his wife and children, who givs them the strength of his arm, the thought of his brain, the warmth of his heart, has not religion, the world is better off without it, for these are the highest and holiest things that man can do. L. K. WASHBURN.

The Impending Revolution.

So you think there is going to be a revolution, eh?

Yes, I think so.

When?

Oh, I don't know the day, the month, or the year, but it will come off in the not-far-distant future, I think.

Will it be a bloody one?

That depends. But I don't think there will be much blood-letting, however. There may be sporadic cases—perhaps a comparativly large amount of bloodshed in the aggregate—but I don't think there will be an epidemic of blood-letting.

My reasons for thinking so?

Oh, well, let me illustrate. For instance, you, a man of peace, weighing 140 lbs., meet John L. Sullivan, a "good man," weighing some 200 lbs., on a plank crossing over a mud-puddle. John, knowing his powers, and that you, against him, are as a frog against an ox, claims the right of way, standing not upon discussion. What are you going to do? Are you going to dispute his passage, or are you going to turn back, or jump into the mud-puddle? A sensible man, you will take to the mud or the back track, of course. To be sure, you might dispute his passage, vi et armis, and possibly get him into the mud along with yourself; but where would you be, and in what condition, when John L. emerged from the mud? The thought of this would giv you pause, I think. You would turn back or go into the mud, as I said before.

Understand that, from the preponderance of weight, the superiority of numbers, on the uprising side of the house, I see how it can be a revolution of force, and yet a bloodless one—or comparativly so. It will be the rise and march of a giant of prodigious proportions and physical power, not a ponderous brute merely, but a giant of intelligence, against a mortal of ordinary physique, but financially powerful, keenly intelligent, and a master of finesse. If the latter undertakes to oppose the giant physically—and no other sort of opposition is to be thought of for that crisis—bloodshed must necessarily follow, for the giant with cut and thrust will meet cut and thrust; but, as he will very quickly overpower his puny antagonist in the fray, the amount of blood spilled will not be large, I take it. In short, the revolutionists will form an irresistible force, and irresistible forces move to their objectiv points with far less friction than resistible ones.

It will be the onslaught of Labor against Capital, you suppose?

Well, not quite so bald-headed as you put it. It will be the might and right of Labor against the might and wrong of Capital—that's the way I put it, and as it appears to me.

Will I state the conditions, as they appear to me?

Yes. There are, at least, ten million workers in this country—mind you, I don't accept parsons, who claim to be "workers;" Wall street bandits, bank presidents, et al., as workers, albeit they "work" their livings and fortunes out of the community, but workingmen in the sense as understood—three millions of whom are organized in one way or another, but organized.

One million, at least, are regularly, solidly, and splendidly organized—"minute men," I might say. This is a pretty good army, but it can be trebled within ten days, doubled then within thirty. But let it go at the treble, the irresistible force I spoke of. Now, suppose this mighty host should lay down its tools some fine day—matters being understood beforehand—and say to their oppressors:

"Gentlemen"—no, grabocrats, monopolists, and robbers in general—"we will work for you no longer under the existing order of things. There has got to be a change, and we propose to hav a voice in the say concerning that change!"

Now, what are the capitalistic class, Jay Gould, Wall street, and financial bandits in general going to do about it, eh? Oppose the workers, you say. Certainly they will with their tongues, but how else? With our army of a few men and many officers?

The militia, eh? Yes, I know there is a militia—now—but when the many labor organizations hav called out their men, where is your militia then? Echo will answer, Where? malgre the officers and a few high privates who may answer roll call.

But volunteers will flock to fill up the ranks, you say. They will, eh? Where will they flock from? From the work-shops? If there are enough left in the work-shops to fill up the ranks of the militia, will they flock to fight their brother-workmen? Honestly, do you think they will?

There are the middling and higher classes, you suggest. Yes, I know. But do not you believe they will flock to the number of three million or more to do battle with guns in their hands? No, you do not believe it. The armies of the world hav never been composed of such material to any great extent, and this army you would improvise is only in your mind. Some few, comparativly speaking, of the shop-keepers might consent or decide to go on the warpath under shoulder straps, and carrying swords in their hands, but guns, never; and guns win, not swords. As for the higher classes, the aristocrats, they are not worth mentioning as men likely to enlist as fighting soldiers. Under eagles and stars a few might take up their swords and ride as staff officers; but afoot as fighting soldiers, never. They are not fond of "rifle diet," never were, and never will be. When armies are made up of such recruits, grim-visaged war will hav smoothed his wrinkled front for ever, and men will but play at soldiering, with "pomp and pride," to be sure, but minus "circumstance." Come, now, where is the army coming from that is to oppose the army coming from the workshops?

You don't know? Of course you don't. Who does? Well, now, can't you see that the coming revolution must needs be more or less a peaceable one? That it will partake largely of the nature of a "walk over," for obvious reasons? The impact of a force meeting with no adequate opposition? But it will be revolution all the same, accomplishing its aims with little bloodshed, comparativly; or much, if you can oppose its force with a force worthy the name of opposition. All around the horizon, here, there, and everywhere, there are fires, little fires and bigger fires. They will grow and spread, and one day unite in a grand conflagration; then will the revolution be on.

You know, and I know, and so do all, save those who hav made it extremely probable, that a revolution is in order, that it is high time it were on. Let it come, bloodless or bloody, as it may be; though, to tell the honest truth, I think a bloody one would prove of more lasting benefit to the country, in that the twin monsters, grinding monopoly and official corruption, would not so readily forget it.

SI SLOKUM.

St. Paul.

Canon Farrar, England's highest prelate, says, "It took all St. Paul's splendid genius and eloquence to save Christianity" from being dragged into Judaism by the other apostles. That St. Paul established Christianity—that is, the doctrin of Christianity, for I do not believe that there is a Christian on earth to-day, nor ever was one—there can be no doubt.

That St. Paul was at swords' points and in continual war with the rest of the apostles there is all the evidence in the world.

I propose to show in this paper, in opposition to the teachings of the entire clergy, that the other apostles were all united against Paul and his doctrin; that they made his life bitter in the extreme. At Paul's conversion, when he came to Jerusalem, even after his old friend Barnabas had introduced him to the apostles, they would hav nothing to do with him (see Acts ix, 26, 27), and from that day to Paul's death he was hunted down and denounced by the other apostles.

Fourteen years after Paul's conversion to Liberalism—for he had been a colossal bigot before, and he says himself that he was a heretic—he went up to Jerusalem to stop James, the Lord's brother, from sending emissaries out among the gentile converts of Paul, and undoing his work. Paul succeeded in getting James and the other apostles to meet in conference, and there he got them to execute a decree that the gentile converts should not be subject to the law of Moses—that is, to the Old Testament.

After Paul delivered this decree to all the churches he had established, he met Peter at Antioch (see letter to Galatians) The said Peter had been playing the modern hypocritical role, for Paul found him eating, drinking, going in and out and associating with the gentiles as an equal, and conforming to gentile customs and gentile liberty. "But when certain ones came from James" Peter withdrew from the gentiles and Paul took Peter in public and held him up to the scorn and contempt of all honorable men and in unmistakable language denounced him as a hypocrit.

The apostles tried to undo Paul's work at Corinth, and St. John, in Revelation, says, "He claimed to be an apostle, but was not an apostle."

The fact is, Paul was recognized as the Infidel of the age, and, unlike modern preachers, he preached without a salary, and boasted of the fact.

He says "he labored more than all of them," and catalogs his trials, troubles, shipwrecks, his meeting false brethren, and how he fed the poor apostles and poorer church at Jerusalem with gentile money; how he was beaten with the Roman rods, forty stripes save one; how he suffered imprisonment, and in his hour of trial before Nero his fellow-workers forsook him.

The church in Jerusalem died, but Paul's work lived and now livs to refresh human hearts panting after eternal liberty and truth.

Paul regarded not the Sabbath, nor any other day, but the theme of all his discourses was liberty—that the law ought to die, and Paul helped mightily to kill it. In fact, Paul's whole life was given to destroying the Old Testament scriptures, and he succeeded.

The climax came in his work about twenty years after his conversion. When his work among the gentiles was established, and liberty proclaimed, he went up to preach his gospel among the Jews, and the other apostles were dumfounded. James said: "Something must be done, for they must needs hear of thy coming, and will come together to hear thee. For they hav heard that everywhere you hav spoken against the law of Moses."

The multitude did come together and mobbed Paul, and it took about four hundred soldiers to save his life, and while Paul was speaking from the steps of the tower of Autonia, and saying that the gentiles were also beloved of God, they threw dust in the air and attempted to kill Paul, so that the chief captain of the guard hurried him into the tower and sent him away to Cesarea that night. But Paul had accomplished his work. He had forever broken up Judaism and the apostolic church at Jerusalem, and had with one blow blotted out the law of Moses, and henceforth it was "liberty in Christ" with the gentile world.

Before Paul saw this great central light of liberty "that one's liberty leaves off only where another's begins," he says he persecuted and murdered men and women for opinion's sake. He killed and imprisoned men and women because they did not believe as he did. In that age, and down to the formation of our government, burning and killing men and women for not believing the Bible was considered doing God service; that is, for not believing the Bible as the priests and preachers taught it.

What a figure in human history was St. Paul! Paul the bigot, Paul the persecutor, Paul the murderer, Paul the converted, Paul the builder of the law of love and liberty, Paul the persecuted, Paul the sweet spiritual lover of our race, Paul the builder and founder of the colossal church of liberty, the first-born of the earth; Paul the beheaded, the martyr of the gentile world, and whose doctrin has slumbered and slept in Catholic catacombs, in the Vatican, and in the dead languages, until his latest disciple, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, has proclaimed that all men, rich and poor, should love one another, and should not be happy if another is miserable!

Higher than the Liberty Statue.

In this morning's Daily News the statue of Liberty just inaugurated at New York is described as towering "to the skies above all known statues of the present and the past," and as "the Great Eastern of statues." The writer may be excused for not knowing that a much higher statue exists, and has long existed, in Afghanistan. . . . These statues are on the principal road between Cabul and Balkh, at a locality known as Bamian. At that place the road passes through valleys, with high scarped cliffs of conglomerate. Probably about the early centuries of the Christian era the Buddhists excavated numerous caves, as monasteries for themselvs, in the rock of these valleys. These ancient excavations still exist, and can be counted by thousands. In addition to these, a number of statues of Buddha were cut out of the solid rork. Two at least are still standing, and the largest was measured by Captain Talbot with the theodolite; so that we now know the hight to at least a few inches. The measurement gave it as 173 feet high; that is rather more by a few inches than the Nelson Column in Trafalgar square, and nearly 70 feet higher than the New York figure. This figure of Buddha is the real "Great Eastern" of statues. The celebrated Memnon statues of Egypt would only come up to the knee of this mighty ikon. At Bamian there is another figure of Buddha, 120 feet high. These are erect standing figures; there is also a sitting figure about 30 feet high. There are the remains of two other figures, but they are in a ruinous condition—one of them is estimated to hav been about 50 or 60 feet. These statues were originally, we know, either gilt or covered with metal, The Chinese Pilgrim, Hiouen Thsang, passed the spot in the first half of the seventh century, A.D., and from him we hav a description of the two largest figures as they existed at that date.—London Daily News.

Mr. Ingersoll's Lay Sermon.

We hav the permission of Mr. Ingersoll to publish this sermon in pamphlet form for general circulation. For this purpose he has kindly revised it, and we shall offer it to the public just as he said it at first and indorsed it on second thought.

The pamphlet will be twenty-four pages, large type, with cover. The price will be, single copies, 5 cents; per dozen, 50 cents; twenty-five copies for $1. Special rates on larger orders.

About a million copies of this little book ought to be circulated among the laborers and the clergy during the next month.

Reduced in Price.

We call especial attention to Miss Susan H. Wixon's "Story Hour" for children, the price of which has been reduced to one dollar.

No better book for a present to the young folks has been printed. It is entertaining, instructiv, and free from superstition. Its hundred illustrations are alone worth more than a dollar.

Those who hav not already done so should make their children a present of a copy.

A Misdirected but Useful Petition.

It is very gratifying to the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER to see the general public coming around to his view of the Anarchist cases in Chicago. The religious press still clamors for blood, and a few of the monopolistic papers are yet rabid in expression. But the common-sense people, the workers and thinkers, are finding out that the trial of the condemned men was unfair; that the verdict was against the evidence; and that the execution of the accused would be unjust. The Central Labor Union of this city is the official representativ of some hundred thousand laborers, and the Union is vigorously pushing a petition for a new trial for the eight prisoners. Not as Anarchists, or Communists, or Socialists do the hundred thousand ask this, but as American citizens, as patriots who do not want our flag disgraced, as individuals who believe in justice between man and man. And while a petition to a court is an unusual proceeding, and cannot rightly affect the decision of the judges—which must be rendered upon the law and evidence—it still shows what public sentiment is, and may affect the governor of Illinois in case the higher court refuses a new trial or affirms the verdict rendered by the court of trial. The petition reads:

To the People of the United States:

We, the members of the Central Labor Union of the city of New York, do hereby appeal in behalf of the eight men who are under sentence at Chicago, seven of whom are under sentence of death and one under sentence of fifteen years' imprisonment, and the names of whom are as follows: A. R. Parsons, August Spies, Michael Schwab, Samuel Fielden, Louis Lingg, Frederick Engle, Adolph Fischer, and Oscar W. Neebe.

Not as Anarchists or Socialists do we formulate this, our petition, but in the name of all honest men, in the name of every lover of justice, do we seek to erase from the face of history the blot which has been cast thereon by the conviction of these men for the public expression of their opinion and belief. We appeal to you because the circumstances of their conviction warrant the assertions following:

1. That a fair and impartial trial was impossible under the circumstances.

2. That at the trial of these men no evidence was produced to show that either of them was guilty of throwing a bomb, or that either of them was directly or indirectly connected with the throwing of a bomb.

3. That the conviction of these men was not in accordance with a just and equitable administration of the law, but in accordance with the demands of an unreasoning and prejudiced popular sentiment created by the press.

Therefore, we, the members of the Central Labor Union of the city of New York, do hereby appeal to every honest man, to every lover of justice, to affix his signature to this, our petition, that the eight unjustly convicted men hereinbefore mentioned be granted by the authorities a new, fair, and impartial trial. In support of the foregoing petition, we, the undersigned, hav affixed our signatures.

That is the voice of the humanitarians of New York—for humanity finds its best and highest expression among the workers—and the voice should be listened to by the authorities of Illinois. The country is one, and state lines are only convenient limits for ease of government. Everyone wants Illinois to be true to herself and to American principles. The idea that lynch law—practical Anarchy—prevailed in Chicago at the time of this trial is spreading all over the country, and no one believes that now, when Chicago is sober, a jury would hang men on the knavish testimony of ex-convicts and bloodthirsty detectivs.

Let the men hav a new and fair trial, and if found guilty of taking life or destroying property, let suitable punishment be given them. But do not, for the honor of the human race, in a land guaranteeing free speech, hang men for making a few observations.

Patent Medicin Religion.

Some one has sent us a copy for October of a monthly publication called The Annals of our Lady of the Sacred Heart, being, it appears, the monthly bulletin of the archconfraternity of the same lady's cardiac region. The object of its publication seems to be to advertise the wares for sale at the apostolic school of St. Joseph, Watertown, N. Y.; and purchasers hav quite an extended choice of pious goods. The first article in the list is entirely spiritual. He who sends the insignificant sum of twenty-five cents shares in the benefit of fifty-two masses for himself and his deceased relativs or friends. Everyone who sends a dollar for the works of the missionaries of the Sacred Heart will share in the daily mass in perpetuity. Still more tangible goods which the pious obtain in exchange for cash are advertised in the following list. The goods, it will be noticed, are going dirt cheap:

Silver medals of Our Lady of the Sacred Heart, each	$ .12
Per dozen	1.20
The Little Crown of Our Lady	.15
A Novena to Our Lady, with a Short Notice on the Archconfraternity of Our Lady, and other Prayers to Our Lady, one copy by mail	.05
Special rates on large quantities
The Litany of Our Lady, per dozen (cheaper by the hundred)	.25
The Third Order of Our Lady	.10

Besides this list of goods to be sent by mail, the missionaries of the Sacred Heart hav other novelties for the holidays. By a small cash advance, customers can hav for their benefit a lamp burning in Watertown filled with pure olive oil—no cottonseed imitation. The tariff for a lamp is:

For nine days	$ .75
For thirty days	2.00
For one year	25.00

Wax tapers and candles come cheaper—from ten to forty cents. It is a great scheme, this making the outsider pay for the lights for the institution! The lady of the holy organ has disposed of a great many of her favors, as is proved by the following accurately located testimonials to the virtue of the goods retailed. The first is from Ontario:

"N——, ONT.

"For some time I hav intended to beg you to hav thanks returned to Our Lady of the Sacred Heart for a request which I obtained through a novena you made to her for me. I suppose it is not too late yet. N. B."

A novena, by the above list, costs only five cents. Cheap enough surely, and "N. B." evidently thinks it as sure as it is cheap. And a novena is as good for dyspepsia as it is efficacious in inducing God to answer prayer:

"A——, N. Y.

"Some time ago I happened to see one of the Annals of Our Lady of the Sacred Heart, and at the time, which is only a few weeks ago, I was quite ill, suffering from a most violent pain in my side, and dyspepsia of long standing. I made a novena to Our Lady of the Sacred Heart, and promised, in case I would get better, to subscribe to the Annals for a little community here. I should add that I grew better almost immediately, and am at present feeling better than I hav felt for some years. SR. M. V."

The above testimonial is right to the point, and should result in large sales of novenas for dyspepia—directions for using with each bottle. The following, which we presume is from Chicago, has the merit of not pinning the writer down to inconvenient accuracy:

"CH——, ILL.

"Thanks are returned for a person who since being recommended goes to mass when she can. M. D."

Going to mass when she can is probably as religious as we can expect a Chicago woman to be. But if she takes a novena three times a day—well shaken—who knows what results may come? The next is still more general in statement:

"B. CL——, KY.

"I return thanks to Our Lady of the Sacred Heart for several favors received. S. A. S."

In this one the burning lamp is alluded to in the judicious manner calculated to increase orders:

"S. H——, N. Y.

"Please burn a lamp in thanksgiving to Our Lady of the Sacred Heart and St. Joseph for favors received. I promised it some time ago. C. R."

The last which we can quote is a glittering generality for the promiscuous benefit of the association:

"S——, ALA.

"During the last year Our Lady of the Sacred Heart did much for us. Gratitude obliges me to acknowledge it. My great confidence in the Blessed Virgin causes me to hav recourse again to the prayers of the association.

"B. V. R. S. C."

The Association of Our Lady With A Sacred Heart is a great institution. It givs us pleasure to make known the effectivness of her remedies, and we shall not send any bill to Watertown for this advertisment. If the missionaries feel like sending us a novena or two, or burning some sacred oil in our especial behalf, we will further publicly acknowledge all the good it does us.

Incompetent Physicians.

Not since they opposed the Abolitionists and quoted for the edification of the blacks, "Cursed be Cain; a servant of servants let him be," hav the preachers taken so much interest in worldly affairs as since the workingmen began to combine. But it is a poor preacher who cannot now in a sermon or two, or at most a series of four, settle all the economical troubles of the age. The wisdom of the pulpit is phenomenal. With a Bible, a concordance, the works of Calvin, Wesley, Butler, and a few minor religious authorities, the social tangle straightens out before our religious teachers like a railroad track across the prairie.

It is surprising, then, that nothing comes of this inspired enlightenment—that still the agitation goes on, just as though the church had not a remedy already mixed—that the discontented pursue their varied philosophies precisely as if they knew that man must work out his own salvation. The indifference of the workers toward the church must be discouraging to the clergy.

But, when the reason is sought, the attitude of the workers is easily explained. Christianity is a religion of the cradle. More than that, like other religions, it is impracticable. It is not founded on the bedrock principle of human rights, but on the "duties" man is supposed to owe to the ruler of another world. Christ's kingdom, he said, is not of this world. The clergy, therefore, are necessarily hampered in their social theories. So long as they measure their remedies by the standard of religion, so long will the remedies be ineffectiv. Otherworldliness will not do for this world. We are not in heaven at present, and the clergy should bear the fact in mind. The training of a theological seminary is not of the kind that fits a man for practical questions. The clergyman livs in an atmosphere different from other people's. His daily conversation is all of another world; the people he meets are mostly those who think more of their sectarianism than of the ills of workers. Afternoon calls upon the ladies, evenings in prayer-meetings, a few hours in the study preparing other-world sermons from dusty books—these are the preparations the preacher brings to the consideration of the vital questions of the day.

Small wonder is it that the real workers curl the lip when reading "labor sermons."

The world will be helped when the clergy know that they do not know. Then they may go to the school of practical life, with man teachers. Just now folks are not thinking so much of going to heaven as they are of making their condition here a little more tolerable. They are not traveling the church's way, and the church must not only turn aside, but hurry considerably to catch up with the crowd. This it is that makes the labor sermons, now plentiful and long, so thoroughly ridiculous.

The American Secular Union.

The report of the treasurer of the American Secular Union, printed elsewhere, is very discouraging and very encouraging. The first year's work of the Union seems to hav cost an unreasonable amount more than it was worth, and to hav left the organization nearly a thousand dollars in debt.

That was very discouraging.

Taking this year's work by itself from the close of the Congress at Cleveland to the close of the Congress at New York, the Union work was not only exceedingly valuable but was paid for in whole. Carrying the arrears of 1885 to 1886, however, leaves the Union owing a balance of close upon $800, most of which is arrears upon the secretary's salary. The unselfishness of Mr. Putnam in relinquishing his claim relieves the Union of a great burden. Very few workers in the cause of Liberalism, we think, possess enthusiasm and a sufficient spirit of self-sacrifice to yield so large a sum—which he could probably recover from the directors—and continue to work upon so uncertain a basis.

That Liberalism inspires such zealous sacrifice is very encouraging.

There are very few men in this country big enough to undertake singlehanded the practical work demanded of Liberalism. This work, we all know, is the enforcement of Liberalism's demands. No one man could hav stirred New York as the American Secular Union stirred this metropolis last winter upon the question of opening the museums on Sunday. No one man could hav forced New York's legislature to consider a bill for taxing churches. This is the proper work for an organization, and only through organization can it be accomplished. And it was to do just this work that the American Secular Union was revived by the present administration. The first year the Union failed to accomplish much. The second year it accomplished a great deal. What it will do the third year remains to be seen.

There are some drawbacks, however, to organization. Let us follow the example of Colonel Ingersoll when he delivered his "Lay Sermon," and take a text. The following is from the Ironclad Age of Nov. 27, 1886, J. R. Monroe, M.D., editor:

"The American Secular Union elected Courtlandt Palmer president, and the usual string of ornamental vice-presidents and vice-presidentesses. The old officials were generally retained. The purse and the executiv control are still in the hands of the Truth Seeker Company, and the whole matter is narrowed to a business enterprise. This is well, seeing that the great body of Liberals in this country cannot be organized for the general and unselfish advancement of the cause. It is but right for the few who are willing to keep up the semblance of organization, while promoting the general cause according to the best inspiration they hav, to wield it to their own pecuniary advantage. The laborer is worthy of his hire, and we can't expect the few in the van to be unselfish whilst the great army in the rear is indifferent. They who are poking up the chunks ought not to be envied their seats nearest the fire. And besides, extrordinary means are necessary to keep a great Liberal journal alive.

"Subsidy, merit, martyrdom, honest earnings, the generous efforts and contributions of zealous friends, and the private field work done at the public expense, in their combined results are inadequate to make a large Liberal journal a profitable investment. Without the Infidel journals there is an end to the propagation of Liberal views. No cause in our day can make head without the advocacy of the press. Lectures do something, but they are expensiv, and confined to narrow limits. In fact, but for the Liberal press, that multiplies most of them a hundredfold, the very best would die in the few ears they first enter.

"It is hence of the first importance that the Liberal papers of ability and capacity be sustained, whatever else fails. If organization can effect only this in the case of a single journal, it is not in vain; whilst the rest of us skirmishing around on the outskirts of the organized endeavor will pick up what crumbs we can, and support ourselvs as best we may, envying none, and wishing well to all."

If this outbreak were the first or only thing of the kind, we should pay no attention to it. But editors of other Freethought papers hav entertained ideas similar to those expressed by Dr. Monroe, and lecturers hav privately rehearsed the same misinformation. We will not repeat the names; Dr. Monroe may stand for the lot. The Truth Seeker Company is accused of supporting the American Secular Union for the money there is in it. The treasurer's statement shows the falsity of this accusation. Lecturers who hav themselvs been generously helped by the Liberal public and THE TRUTH SEEKER go about the country privately telling those for whom they lecture that all the donations to the Union go to S. P. Putnam. The fact that the Union owes its secretary over one-third of his guaranteed salary is hardly reconcilable with these statements. The purse was never controled by anyone but the directors—certainly not by those suspected by Dr. Monroe. At the solicitation of the old officers one member of the Truth Seeker Company accepted an office in the Union. That officer had no more to do with the funds than has the editor of the Ironclad Age. His functions were limited to raising money, not expending it. That officer was reëlected by the recent Congress, but at the first meeting of the directors he notified the board that his resignation was in their hands, to take effect so soon as his successor could be chosen. This resignation was offered because of these floating insinuations, until now only privately made, but known, nevertheless, to the individual concerned.

Some people can never credit that others act upon disinterested motivs. They know that they never do, and imagin that everyone is like themselvs. And if this spirit must prevail, all those connected with THE TRUTH SEEKER will decline to hav anything more to do with any organization whatever. It is not a pleasant thing to help build up a society for the sake of seeing something accomplished, and then be told that all our efforts were made for pay—especially when the paying part is all the other way.

The ill-concealed slurs upon THE TRUTH SEEKER, the penning of which undoubtedly gave Dr. Monroe great pleasure, are not of sufficient importance to notice. In his "Lay Sermon," Colonel Ingersoll said that men are as they must be—no more responsible for their dispositions than for their hight; not responsible for their acts any more than for their dreams. So we believe, and, believing, hav great charity for all. This is not the first case of mental irresponsibility that has afflicted our esteemed contemporary. When Mr. Bennett was persecuted a few years ago, Dr. Monroe bravely asserted that the persecution was a gross violation of Mr. Bennett's liberties; afterward he intimated that the persecution served the New York editor about right. When asked the reason for his changed view, he explained it by saying that when he so intimated he was suffering from an unusually severe attack of dyspepsia. The indications now are that the good doctor has sustained a relapse.

Organization is probably the only way by which Freethinkers can protect themselvs and obtain their rights. Without help from others, Mr. Reynolds would now be in prison. Organization should be extended, and used for all honorable purposes which individuals cannot achieve. But we frankly avow our belief that until quite a number of Freethinkers lose considerable envy and jealousy, the less we hav of organization the better. When the church shuts a few heretics up for blasphemy, saddles the nation with debts, and puts God in the Constitution, then, perhaps, the organization that resists the tyranny will be allowed to go on its way without quite so much fault-finding from those who profit by the work it does, but who never pay a cent to support it.

An Open Letter to Dr. Talmage.

MOST REVEREND DOCTOR: As the gullible gudgeons of the orthodox variety hav swallowed the red-hot petrified man of Lima, O., and left not even so much as a little toe for your reverence to feast your holy eyes on, I write this to inform you of another wonder which can be found in that locality. About nine or ten miles southeast of Lima, on the Bellefontaine road, may be seen what is said to be the devil's backbone, as thousands of the citizens of Lima and Allen county can testify. A large part of this backbone remains even unto this day, and a good portion of it has turned to stone, and the ungodly churchmen round about hav grown so familiar with this satanic vertebræ that they hav used a good portion of it to decorate their god-houses. Whether this said backbone is the actual vertebral column of the only genuin and original devil, who is a co-partner with Jehovah in the soul-saving business, we know not—it may be one of his boys, or a distant member of that ancient and numerous family. I hav often seen this wonder, and can vouch for the truth of it. It is perfectly cool, and without the least odor of brimstone or other characteristic perfumes from sheol. I would advise you to go and see it, doctor, and carry away a fragment in your pocket, as a tangible proof of defunct devils and the doctrins of the church militant. That country is rich in petrifactions, inasmuch as it is quite common to see petrifactions in the pulpit preaching petrified doctrins to congregations with petrified brains. I hav no doubt but there are whole graveyards of petrified corpses, with ghosts done in stone. It worries me to think about what trouble this may cause on the morning of the resurrection. The Lord will be obliged to turn those stone bodies into flesh and blood and bones again, for it will be a novel sight, and decidedly inconvenient, to hav a lot of petrified angels incumbering the streets and back alleys of the New Jerusalem, and, as their souls will hav to be born again, there may be trouble on account of misfits.

I am sorry, doctor, that you are so much given to abusing Infidels. Don't, my dear doctor, don't do so any more, for you are only worrying yourself, and not hurting us in the least. You should bear in mind that, according to your doctrin of predestination, we are ordained to be damned, and such being the case, we are necessary and integral parts in the great scheme of salvation by which the elect are enabled to prance around among the angels. Whither we go thou shalt not come—they would not hav you—but you will go to the other place, and rest in Abraham's bosom, and eternally play your heavenly jewsharp along with Charles J. Guiteau and numerous other assassins who hav been "jerked to Jesus."

Brother Talmage—excuse me for the implied relationship; it was a slip of the pen, and I am just as much ashamed of it as you are; please don't mention it, for my family are quite as sensitiv as the living relativs of the petrified man—Adieu.

WATSON HESTON.

JUDGE SCOTT, of Illinois, has decided that there is evidence that the Chicago Anarchists were unfairly tried, sufficient to justify a stay of proceedings. Those who hav hitherto amused themselvs by excoriating the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER for holding substantially the same view, can now transfer their attention to the above eminent jurist.

REPORTING the Thanksgiving services at Talmage's church, the Herald man said: "It would hav been difficult for the most confirmed skeptic if he had been present in the Brooklyn Tabernacle to refuse belief in the still living power of Christianity." The reporter should bear in mind that the people visit the Brooklyn Tabernacle not because they love Christianity, but to be amused by the antics of the preacher. He might as well talk about the living power of the circus because the people crowd to see it.

INNUMERABLE journals are copying Mr. Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon" from the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. This is well and good, and spcaks highly for the editors' judgment. The sermon ought to be read by everybody. But we notice that many of the papers—among them the Ironclad Age—say not a word as to the source which enables them to supply their readers with such good matter. This grieves us. We hav no objection to our contemporaries reaping the benefits of our enterprise, but we do think they ought to casually mention that THE TRUTH SEEKER made it possible for them to break the eighth commandment.

IT is difficult to say which excites the most comment, the enormous amount of work performed year after year by J. E. Remsburg, or his promptness and reliability in meeting his engagements. His appointments are often many hundred miles apart, and yet he lectures every night. He has studied the railroad geography of this country, knows every road and train, and never hesitates to go a hundred miles out of his way to avoid delays and gain time. One of his flying trips was made on Monday, November 22d. He was billed for Florence, Mass., Sunday night, and Pottsville, Pa., Monday night. As there are no trains from Florence Sunday night it was necessary for him to remain there eight hours longer than he need to hav done on any other day of the week. He left Florence at 7 A.M., Monday. Instead of waiting for the Springfield train at Northampton, he took the New Haven and Northampton road, getting into New Haven ahead of the fast train for New York. Taking this train he reached the Grand Central depot a little after eleven, having left a hundred and sixty mile-posts between him and Florence. Taking a Fourth avenue car at Forty-second street, he came down to Eighth street, made a visit to THE TRUTH SEEKER office, and then, taking a Broadway car, proceeded down town to Liberty street, crossed the ferry, and, at Jersey City, took a train for Philadelphia. The train was due in Philadelphia at 3:58 P.M. The Reading train left two minutes later. On nearing Philadelphia he found that his train would arrive five minutes late and miss connection. So, instead of running into the city, he dropped off at Wayne Junction, a few miles out, and taking a "dummy" train, crossed over to the main line of the Reading in time to catch the Pottsville train. At 7 P.M. he arrived in Pottsville, making a journey of nearly four hundred miles, including seven changes and a two hours' stop in New York, in twelve hours.

Letters from Friends.

CORTLAND, O., Nov. 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Your grand and noble paper has crossed my threshhold once again, and I will say that friend Spellman has done well, and is willing to do more. All we want now is to organize. There are more Freethinkers about me than I ever dreamed of, for all that they are grinding the Bible in the schools. I think it only a matter of time when our presence will be felt as well as heard. J. D. WHEELER.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Nov. 19, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $7.50 inclosed for pamphlets. I see that numerous local papers throughout the country hav given notice of C. B. Reynolds's arrest for blasphemy. This will answer as a very good and cheap advertisment of the pamphlet upon which he was arrested, and no doubt the same papers will giv notice of how the trial will terminate in January. I suggest, brother and sister Liberals, that you procure a goodly number of the phamphlets and hav them ready for sale by the time the papers giv it a second notice. The enemy has made an assault, and, in the language of ex-President Jackson, steady, Liberals, "and see that every shot counts." JOHN W. ABBOTT.

TRENTON, TEX., Nov. 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The members of the Trenton Secular Union, through THE TRUTH SEEKER, wish to express their delight. We listened to W. S. Bell's great assault against the bulwarks of superstition on November 11th and 12th, at the Bailey and Trenton Hall, when tolerably good audiences learned their A B C's in the school of Freethought.

"Prayer is immoral." How shockingly true! It asks the creator to acknowledge his own mistake and suspend the law. If I burn my hand it is right to suffer, and wrong to ask that the law may be annulled; it is my best friend, and brought me into existence. The same reasoning is forever good.

All Texas friends will do well to hear what this Bell has tolled us. J. W. BELL.

ASHKUM, ILL., Nov. 15, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I receive your paper regularly, and think I never read a better paper for truth and justice. I hav watched with much interest the disputes between our fellow-Liberals, and am pleased with the stand you hav taken concerning the Chicago Anarchists. There are a few outspoken Liberals here, but they don't read any Liberal paper, and say they don't feel able to subscribe just now. Ashkum people are nearly all Catholics, and it is a hard matter to get them to read Liberal journals. One fellow here said that he was once a Freethinker, but a preacher beat him so bad in an argument that he dropped his Infidel tools, and hasn't had any use for them since. I told him I didn't think he was ever a Liberal.

Inclosed find $1, to be used as directed. MAT WHALEN.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 23, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Archbishop Corrigan, in his reply to Mr. George, tells us that God did not curse air and light, but did curse the earth. Can any intelligent man of the nineteenth century actually believe that an omniscient and omnipotent God ever cursed any of his own productions? The idea, to my mind, is not only silly, but actually impious and even blasphemous.

Do not all men with ordinary intelligence perceive that the fact that men hav to work and cannot liv in idleness is not an evil, but a blessing? It is obviously the source of all progress and civilization. If the earth produced her fruits spontaneously, without any thought or exertion on the part of men, we would all be mere animals. In Africa and Central America, and on some islands, are men who can and do liv with very little labor. What kind of men are they? Are they statesmen, philosophers, historians, orators, poets, actors, painters, or ministers of the almighty?

W. H. BENSON.

BARRE, MASS., Nov. 22, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to "return thanks" to Mr. George Wilson [see TRUTH SEEKER, Nov. 20] and others who wrote me "private letters of thanks" for my article that you published October 16th. You see, there are two sides to this question as there are to all others, and it is very commendatory in you, and gratifying to us, that you are disposed to publish all sides. Many thanks to you; long may THE TRUTH SEEKER (and truth getter) wave.

We hav had a hot political contest in the Bay state this fall, and some of the winnings gratify me exceedingly. The Hub, too, is all in commotion. A hot or cold wave has come over it—and you tell which!—in the shape of Mrs. Van Cott and the "boy preacher Harrison," who is now holding forth in Lynn at the modest price of $100 per week. And in January the good Lord is going to send us Sam Jones and Sam Small. What has old Boston done that it needs such disciplin from the hand of the Lord? Conversions are numerous, and honesty scarce!

The Prohibitionists of Maryland hav had a lively row. The first Sunday after their nominations were made for Congress, a meeting was held at which Colonel Odom made a speech in which he eulogized the men named for Congress, and urged Prohibitionists to fight whisky with the ballot; whereupon the Methodist preachers held a meeting denouncing Colonel Odom, and "adopted resolutions declaring that while the Methodist preachers of Baltimore desired to be the friends of temperance, they opposed making use of the Lord's day for the doing of partisan work, and protested against its being converted into a time for political harangs." This action stirred the whole Prohibition party in Maryland, and the state executiv committee straightway held a meeting and denied that the committee authorized the holding of party meetings on the Sabbath. Colonel Odom was much enraged and said: "Some Methodist preachers are so party bound [he should hav said creed bound] that they've got to be converted over again. Malice is the secret of their action. Some Methodist preachers are right and a good many are wrong. One of these preachers says 'the old party will put down liquor selling.' Now, did you ever hear such infernal nonsense? The Methodist preachers on the outside will preach and sing, and on the inside vote for the old political parties, but mostly for the Republican party. They stand by that party all the time. That's the reason they don't like the third party."

Now, brothers and sisters, was not Colonel Odom pretty nearly right? "Where rogues fall out honest people get their dues," is an old saying, but is it not a true one?

But my letter is getting too long for any use, I fear, but the waste basket; so I will close, wishing you a rich, an abundant thanksgiving in the year of our Lord, Nov. 25, 1886.

ELLA E. GIBSON.

BAKER CITY, OR., Nov. 9, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3.50—$2 for the aid of C. B. Reynolds ($1 from myself, the other from George L. Hoys, a renowned old Infidel). The balance is for books you will find named on inclosed slip. I am only a hard-fisted son of toil. I think the work of organization and reform should commence on the Pacific coast. The people are more liberal in their opinions here than in any other part within the broad confines of our Republic. All we need is a good Liberal lecturer. We can organize an auxiliary League here with a hundred charter members. This is a great country, and is bound to become one of the richest mining sections of the United States.

Wishing you a long life of usefulness and prosperity,

Yours for liberty, WESLEY T. MILLER.

SAN JOSE, CAL., Nov. 12, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $5, which apply as follows: $3 to renew my subscription to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, humanity's friend; $1 to assist the Congress of the Secular Union (sorry I can't make it $100); also $1 to aid Brother Reynolds in carrying on the work of destroying superstition and error. I felt very indignant at the ill-treatment he received from those fanatical orthodox mud-slingers. I am in sympathy with the outraged and oppressed of every race and clime. I, therefore, feel it my duty to assist our brave leaders. I hope for the time when the word liberty will be a reality in this boasted land of freedom. Well may Americans blush and hide their heads in shame when called to face the outrages and calumnies visited upon many of our greatest minds—leaders and reformers who hav labored incessantly for the advancement of the human race and the liberties we now enjoy. The great battle against sectarian craft and political intrigue must yet be fought, and the only weapon to conquer these monsters is knowledge. All good and brave men will scorn cowardly fraud and dastardly conduct, be it sectarian, political, or social. Men of true mettle will stand firm, and continue to be the standard-bearers of liberty, justice, and humanity. R. H. SCHWARTZ.

SILVER CITY, IA., Nov. 17, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER just as well as ever, even if you hav got too much mixed up with the Anarchists, Dynamiters, and bomb-throwers. I can stand all the pictures, all your Spiritualism, and all your Freethought. I like the Investigator, too. I believe that the noble cause of Freethought has been helped much by such brave defenders of liberty and equal rights as our noble founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER and his worthy successors. If we are bespattered, the mudscraping will not prevent us from seeking truth or defending liberty, free speech, and equal rights, nor from sympathizing with the oppressed or the oppressor, as the case may be. I believe that a good many so-called Liberals are generally found on the side of the oppressor, and are always ready to point out the line they hav drawn between themselvs and others, and would hav everybody else to take their advice and kind fault-finding in good humor.

I am taking THE TRUTH SEEKER, not to help you along, but to help myself along, and I think every copy is worth the price tenfold. I intend to stay with you until all the Freethinkers, Socialists, Anarchists, Atheists, Spiritualists, and bomb-throwers are thrown in a pile together and sentenced to reading your paper for life. There is no occasion to ride all hobbies.

J. G. KUHN.

ROANOKE, VA., Nov. 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: As Mr. Talmage's story about the man Redyan, of Lima, Ohio, being struck down by Almighty God for blasphemy has turned out to be a myth, I will enlighten the readers of your paper on another one of his subiects, mentioned at the same time, viz.: one Dr. Kyle, of Sullivan Co., N. Y. I was born and raised in that county, and lived there at the time mentioned. I knew Dr. Kyle, and remember the circumstance. In 1859 or '60, diphtheria broke out in a malignant form all over the county. Some lost all of their children, and many grown people in sight of my father's place died. One Philip F. Fulton lost seven out of his family. It was no unusual sight to see two buried from one home at one time. Dr. Kyle was a Thompsonian, and, like all the rest that had not had a trial, claimed he could cure the disease; but as he was not called, he said, it was reported, that if it got into his family he would soon kick it out. Like many others, his family of children were nearly all, if not all, taken with the dreaded scourge and died. It baffled the skill of the best-read physicians for over a year. The disease finally became milder, or else the doctors got to understanding it, as it was never so fatal after that fall. I think it was said at a Free Methodist revival that Dr. Kyle defied the Almighty by saying he would kick the diphtheria out of his house, and God had visited his wrath upon him by taking away his children; but of the numerous others that suffered as bad nothing of the kind was ever said. No one but some religious lunatics supposed it was any visitation of God. It was noticed that those that lived along water courses suffered the most.

Yours for truth, E. STODDARD.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Nov. 19, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: That fossil, the Herald and Presbyter, of Cincinnati, this fall contained a brief article advising its orthodox patrons to "giv skeptics a wide berth." Better follow that advice, all who are afraid to know the truth. How much better is it to only "indulge a hope" of being one of the elect, of being saved by grace as a "brand from the burning," knowing according to scripture that a majority of your own species will be less fortunate, even if your hope should be realized of being saved, than to feel that the only information on that subject comes through an old book, which you know is a fraud from beginning to end? Infidels certainly hav as well grounded a hope as hav Christians, whose only faith is based on untruthful history, fraudulent misrepresentations, and cheeky prediction. I was brought up in the very hotbed of orthodox religion, and I want no more of it. I could, when a child, readily understand why that poor man was doomed to sit forever in the moon, face downward, for picking up chips on Sunday to kindle a fire. I was taught when smitten on one cheek to turn t'other for similar treatment. Learned early to pray for and expect divine help in everything, as > "The birds without barn or storehouse are fed,

> From them let us learn to trust for our bread.
> His saints, what is fitting, will ne'er be denied,
> So long as 'tis written, the Lord will provide."

I was long in getting rid of the old delusion, and came out of the fracas somewhat the worse. It is hard to part with a faith almost bred in the bone, and harder when there were so many of the associations of childhood linked with it. But reason and an honest desire to know the truth hav conquered, and I hav attained to that happy condition in which I can say I hav only the natural animal dread of death, but really no fear, and average a happier life than when professing faith in Christianity. I know also I am as good a man as then. St. Joseph, where I reside, may be said to be a stronghold of Christianity, in all of its gradations and degradations, at least on the surface. Roman Catholic bigotry, avarice, and superstition here run rampant. I see, daily, gangs of priests and brothers leading unsuspecting boys from their schools to the cathedral and confessional. The priests look, oh! so meek, so lamb-like, in their black Father Hubbards. Also "sisters," with their white, angel-winged hoods flapping in the breeze, looking, oh! so innocent, as they walk along at the head of processions of deluded girls from school to confessional and mass.

The Catholics here, as elsewhere, own the finest building sites in the city, and grounds in extent far beyond their necessities, fabulously valuable. These are virtually owned by the priests and brothers whose livings they afford. To the already large and fine buildings they are constantly making costly additions, to aid which they solicit and receive much assistance from Protestants. As all their colleges contain a chapel, of course they will not be taxed. These Catholics are just alike the world over, united, of course, because they draw inspiration from the same infallible fountain-head, that old "man of sin," the pope. They will concede nothing, only just as they are taught by the priest. They pray for, and look forward to, the time when the lion and lamb can lie down together, of course, fully believing the Catholic lion will be on the outside. One thing is singular but significant, one no longer hears the Protestant churches railing out against the Roman Catholic as a few years ago—but little opposition to its aggressivness. Hav they already begun to anticipate a union of all Christians? No doubt, already many of them are ready to acknowledge that the pope is a jolly good fellow after all. Well, it is with all of them a clear admission of weakness, and their only ultimate hope of breasting the storm of reason and reform, which Infidelity has aroused, and which, like a great ground swell, threatens to upheave all ancient superstitions, and bring about the universal brotherhood of man. Their motto is, "Of two evils (union or Infidelity), choose the least—union." It looks so.

An old lady, mother of a prominent miuister in this city, remarked on seeing a Protestant lady taking her children to the cathedral (their father, deceased, was a Unitarian): "Well, I would sooner see them made Catholics than Unitarians. They (the Catholics) take Christ." Great God! (if there is a personal God), how long will we hav to bear with this hydra-headed monster? When will Americans wake up to the wily movements of Catholics, who yet hope not only to overthrow free schools, but to rule the country?

"FAITHLESS."

SOUTH OTSELIC, Nov. 19, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I beg the privilege of saying a few words to you and the general public through the columns of your paper. I want to throw my influeuce, little as it may be, in favor of justice toward those condemned so-called Anarchists of Chicago. Since the evidence upon which they were convicted, and now lie in their cells awaiting execution, is wholly circumstantial, and of the very lamest kind, and denied as they were the benefit which the law declares all criminals are at all times entitled to, viz., that of a doubt, it is more and more apparent to every justice-loving man and woman that their trial was, like D. M. Bennett's, a mere farce, and their conviction and sentence entirely premeditated. Is it still possible that after all the costly, inhuman, and mortifying experiences that we, as citizens of a so-called free republic, hav had in the past, and so lately as that of the murder (legalized though it were) of John Brown, the hanging of witches on Boston Common, the imprisonment of D. M. Bennett, Abner Kneeland, and other grand reformers, I repeat, is it still possible for the free-minded American citizens, both men and women, to be awed into silence, while revenge, backed up by money and pious zeal, can, by the voice of one judge, hurl into "everlasting life" and redoubled power seven more victims of religious monopoly and hate? Is it still possible for this oft-repeated farce and worse than mockery, "trial by jury," to be again repeated in the very midst of our boasted civilization, and men, who evidently hav been guilty of no crime, unless it be that of having been born, like Charles Mackay, one hundred years too soon, pleading for their lives like Socrates, Bruno, and scores of others, while we, the people, eat, drink, and are merry? I am not an Anarchist, but that is not the question. I am not a Socialist, but that is of no consequence in this case. These seven or eight men with brains and souls had a right, according to the Constitution of these free states, to propagate their peculiar ideas. And how absurd to suppose that men of their purpose and intellect would fire a bomb into the midst of a gathering of their own friends, endangering not only their own lives but those upon whom they relied to help advance their cause. Who is to atone for the loss to the wives and children of these men, for the lives that are dearer to them, perhaps, than their own? Who can estimate the hourly agony of those men and their families?

It may be asked of me, What can be done about it? I propose for THE TRUTH SEEKER to send out petitions to all of its subscribers, and let the friends of justice add their names to the list who are willing to beg for a new trial for these men, or, if that be denied, beg for a commutation of their sentence. I am very hard pressed far money, as a stroke of lightning took me out of $500 last July, but I will giv $1. to help start this thing and pay toward the petition, and I will circulate one if I can get it. Who will be the next? Come, friends, remember this is not your life nor mine, but those who are just as dear as ours. We must act quickly or it will be too late, and then we can do as we did in the case of John Brown, sing, "Glory hallelujah," over a lost cause the rest of our lives. MARY PECK.

ST. CATHERINES, ONT., Nov. 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 6th that Mr. Thomas Burk, of Salesville, M. T., wants his statement whether wheat will pass to chess explained. He says that some years ago there was winter wheat on his ranch, and after it had jointed cattle grazed it; but some stools were left untouched, others were entirely eaten off, while others were partly eaten. Those untouched, he says, grew up wheat; those eaten off started again from the stool and came up chess, and those half-eaten came partly wheat and partly chess. Now, there is not a particle of proof in Mr. T. Burk's statement that that wheat did pass to chess; and it is evident those plants that had been eaten off and came up chess were not wheat but chess plants, and of course would grow chess again.

Again, he says those half-eaten came partly wheat and partly chess. This I do not dispute, but when he says from the same stool, he certainly makes a random assertion, for I am positiv that he nor any other man ever saw wheat and chess that grew from the same root; and if he had taken the roots of those wheat and chess plants out of the ground and examined them, he would hav seen that that wheat and chess did not grow from the same root.

It is possible for wheat and chess to grow so near each other as apparently to hav but one root, like Mr. Burk's, and that, no doubt, has deceived him and many others.

I infer from Mr. Burk's statement that he, as well as many others, believes that if wheat is cropped, broken down, choked, frozen, stunted, or in any other way injured during its growth, it will then turn to chess. But of this I hav had so much proof to the contrary that I am positiv no such change has ever taken place. Some years ago we had a frost here the 6th and 10th of June that killed all the wheat heads that were out of their sheaths, but it grew up again from the root, and, behold, it was wheat again, but it did not ripen. Now, this wheat must hav suffered badly, being twice frozen, yet it did not turn its second crop to chess, nor the wheat heads that were then yet sheathed.

Now, all those who believe that wheat will turn to chess should, before making any more random assertions, prove it. Try it, farmers; expose ground in a pot to an intense heat (for chess seeds are very tenacious of life), and after it is cold, sow wheat in it. Then, during its growth, do your best to make it yield chess; and I am positiv the first trial will convince you that wheat cannot be forced to yield any other grain but wheat. A. MOOT.

SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., Nov. 20, A.S. 286.

MR. EDITOR: The pictures are the glory of our noble old TRUTH SEEKER. Like a flash they impress upon the mind truths never to be forgotten. I only wish it were possible to afford more space in order that Heston might send a shot now and then in the ranks of a certain class of Spiritualists; it might keep them somewhat closer to reason and common sense. I saw not long since in a Spiritual paper how the noble red man was seen (clairvoyantly, of course) sitting wonderfully contented, with dog and gun, right in the midst of his happy hunting-grounds. O shades of all the philosophers that ever lived! protect us from our friends the Spiritualists! What in sheol did he want with his dog there, and much less his gun, when he couldn't kill even the vilest thing that ever crawled?

Mr. Editor, I scarcely know how to express my thanks to you for continuing my paper so long without payment; but keep sending it if you possibly can, and Dexter J. Smith's too. I'll vouch for both, and I assure you he and I will find a way to make it. Congress soon meets, and I hav great hopes for the passage of the Mexican pension bill; it will set me all afloat.

I inclose you something that looks more like poetry than it reads:

"THERE IS NO DEATH."

An Indian left this world of strife.
Of course he did not die—
He simply passed to spirit life,
Upward toward the sky.

He livs in that bright summer-land
With his faithful dog and gun,
Yet with the happy hunting band
He sees but sorry fun.

The game when shot, it never dies—
Alas! it cannot die!
For "there's no death." "O Lord!" he cries,
And heaves a famished sigh.

He sits him down with hunger pressed,
And wild in grim despair.
He must eat something soon, he guessed,
Or get some other where.

"At last," quoth he, "I've found a way,
A plan that needs must thrive;
I'll trap this deathless-gifted prey,
And eat it up alive."

NELSON HUNT.

MURRAY, IDAHO, Nov. 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: As you hav not heard from me for a long time, I thought I would write a few lines to let you know that I am not dead yet, and that I keep the banner of Freethought afloat. I find a great many Liberals here, but they are unsettled, and it would be almost impossible to form a Liberal society at present. I think by next summer it could be accomplished, with the aid of a good speaker to giv us two or three lectures. I was in hopes that our worthy secretary would go further West from Utah, and come back by the North Pacific Railway, and stop off at Spokane Falls and come through this way, but he went south of us. This is going to be one of the richest mining camps in America in a few years, and will be a fine field for a Liberal lecturer if he gets ahead of the priests, though the priests hav been here already. I am one of the school trustees here, and I hav denied them the use of our schoolhouse to do their false teaching in. I expect to get a row on my hands, but, as I am right, I am going to fight them.

I hope the Union will keep Mr. Putnam in the field, as he is doing a good work. I hope also that Mr. Reynolds will paint New Jersey red. If I had fifty of our mountain miners there we could wipe out the whole town, and that is what they ought to get. I am fifty-five years old, but not too old to shoulder a gun against that kind of cattle.

Keep up the pictures; they talk louder than words. I think I can get you more subscribers before spring. I will do all I can for the good old TRUTH SEEKER. A. ERVIN.

IRWIN, IA., Nov. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: With regard to E. C. Walker's so-called autonomistic marriage, I think it is "a great deal of cry and very little wool," as the negro said while stealing a pig that he had thought to be a lamb. If he succeeds on his final plea it settles the question beyond all controversy that he is legally married with all the rights and liabilities that belong in law to husband and wife. He pleads simply that the law marries them (the common law, or leges non scripta) in spite of all their protestations and agreements to the contrary, if they agree to liv together. So that, according to his own pleading, the only thing in issue is the necessity of getting a license. and this license, in this view of the case, is more properly named, "Marriage registration," and in dollars and cents, I believe, it amounts in Kansas to just $2. Yes, that is about the size of it! A two-dollar martyr! Bully for autonomy! Hurrah for Anarchy!

Those Chicago fellows and Herr Most are just pigmies now compared with this Kansas giant. Theoretically E. C. Walker is radically right; practically he is opposed to his own theory. Although Walker's indictment, following the legal phrase and form, charges him with "unlawful cohabitation," yet the specifications show that it is not the "cohabitation" but the neglect to procure a license—under the common law simply a system of registration—that constitutes his offense. Having suffered the penalty it is then no offense, but rather his legal duty, to "cohabit;" and if his plea is sustained, as I think it will be, he is liable if he does not discharge the duties of a husband toward his co-defendant, Lillian Harman. I am in harmony with those who demand the right of self-hood in the freedom of contract, but I shall always insist upon some public acknowledgment or registration of such contracts.

Talking of Anarchy reminds me to say I protest most indignantly and vehemently against Gary's ruling in the case. I hav heard in an indirect, and not very reliable way, that "a tall, dark, complexioned man," giving the name of Cummins or Cummings (Jim, I think) and, supposed to hav some connection with the James and Younger boys, in the course of talk claimed that he was the bomb-thrower at Chicago, and that he was just getting his hand in good practice to pay off the Pinkertons for the bomb they threw. Cummings, or whatever his name may be, is reported to hav said that he did not know anything about the Anarchists, or they anything about him—that he was a "whole team" himself, and "enough for the Chicago police and the damned Pinkertons without any help from any one." I am going to borrow a book about the James and Youngers and see for myself if it givs any ground to believe that there is or ever was such a person as this Cummins or Cummings.

However, it cannot be made to serve any purpose favorable to the Anarchists that I can see. I guess it would be utterly impossible to get it into the shape of evidence. Is that doctrin (or slush) of Gary's to stand as law? If so, Anarchy finds its justification right there. It denies the right of revolution; the right to argue it, to contemplate it as a remote possibility or as a dernier resort in this country under any circumstances. I wonder what our Revolutionary sires would say to that. For my own part, I believe that wrong is so entrenched behind organic legislation that a bloody revolution must sooner or later take place, and if this be treason, or if I must hang as a particeps criminis for the next case of bomb-throwing, why, so be it! When I throw my bomb it will hav company—there will be organized revolution, not for no law, but for better law. J. K. B. BAKER.

DETROIT, MICH., Nov. 22, 1886.

TO THE LIBERAL PEOPLE (who listened to and read a Lay Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll): What do you think of it? Do you see any point to it? Can it be possible that Mr. Ingersoll does not see and know that the something wrong in our government is but the exact reflection of the something wrong in every other government throughout the civilized world? And yet Mr. Ingersoll and every other Liberal and reform advocate has always acquiesced and upheld the cause of all the wrongs and evils that they claim to desire to reform. Mr. Ingersoll says there is something wrong when honesty wears a rag, and rascality a robe; when the loving, the tender, eat a crust, while the infamous sit at the banquets. So there is something wrong. The people are deprived of real money, which is the vitality, the life of industry, and are obliged to do all business transactions upon credit; and thousands of bankers are licensed to rob them by issuing bankers' debts as counterfeit money, and oblige the lifeless people to buy this counterfeit money at high and oft-repeated premiums to pay the interest on the wealth that labor has created and has been robbed of. Allow me to say to Mr. Ingersoll that one dollar of debt is as truly slavery as one dollar wrongfully appropriated from the rightful owner is theft; and there has never been any other cause of slavery on earth but that which was caused by depriving people of money to transact business on a cash principle. In this country there has never been any money, and there has always been slavery. It has always been true that the borrower is the slave of the lender. No man ever borrowed money unless he was obliged to, and when any man borrows money it is proof positiv that he livs in a land of slavery. Will any one deny this? To hav a full legal tender money issued by the people through the government, sufficient to pay every transaction in business at once, and keep every one free from debt, is the only possible way to liberty. And until Mr. Ingersoll and all Liberals see this and work for it, they are only acting the part of the man looking for work and doing all he can not to get it. The Nine Demands of Liberalism are only demands for the removal of nine effects of the want of money in the country to keep the people free; and no liberty can possibly ever come from such demands any more than to dam up a river can do good to the country below the dam. We hav been fighting effects for thousands of years, but never hav been free, simply because society must hav money—free money—just as much as animal life must hav air. We must destroy the one cause of poverty, slavery, war, vice, and crime that has ever sat behind the throne. The power of the money-lender has always been the great power behind all civil power all over the earth; and though the slaves in one or more countries hav in hundreds of cases fought and won their liberty, yet the emissaries of the power behind the throne hav always been able to slip the shackles upon the minds and limbs of the ignorant victors and lead them into deeper captivity again every time. Never hav the people demanded and obtained liberty to be free from debt, and never has industry been supplied with its vitalizing influence. Society has never been supplied with the very fiber to hold it together; civilization has never been supplied with its germ even to this day. Civilization and society hav ever been deprived of those qualifications which are as essential to their existence as oxygen is to animal life.

Now, all of Mr. Ingersoll's most glowing and most touchingly truthful lay sermon is answered in its search for the cause of all evils, and the remedies that he proposes cannot help us unless some one leads the people to see what givs liberty and what deprives the people of liberty. Where there is no debt, there can be no rich nor poor; no slavery nor war. It cannot be shown on any spot on earth that pinching want ever existed where there was no deprivation of money for each to use free from money-lenders' control. There is no injustice to any single person in free money. It is the only true corner-stone of liberty, and yet it has never, never been placed in the foundation of a civilized government.

Where, oh, where, in the name of common sense, is the use of demanding the taxation of churches and religious property when there is no money in the country for anyone to pay taxes with? It is like charging paupers with their poverty while they are unable to find work to do, and you doing nothing to make work for them. Let us be sensible enough to seek and labor for liberty for churches and all people to be free from debt, and there will be no more untaxed church or any other property in a country that is free. Mr. Ingersoll says that, in sending a man to prison, we tend to make a beast of him. Can slavery bring forth anything but beasts? When the money-lenders controled the government of England to destroy their free government money, the it ony did purpose to make slaves of the people to debt, and when, in 1865, the same power controled the government of the United States to destroy our free money, which they had already degraded, they did it for the same purpose of putting the people into slavery to debt, and Mr. Ingersoll and every other honest man acknowledges that they hav had ample success, and no one has yet raised his voice in opposition. We are on the same path to war that we traveled thirty years ago. We hav an army in our prisons, and as many more in the same state of mutiny outside, ready for war. Will the Liberals—will Colonel Ingersoll raise his voice for liberty and peace, a peace that must and will spread over the whole earth, making all people free from debt slavery and the slavery of debt? Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Paradoxical Woman.

Alas! she is how strange a lass!
A dear, but not a deer.
She is an heir, but not an air—
Drinks beer, but drinks no bier.

She oft sheds tears, but sheds no tiers—
Needs bread and kneads it not.
She has a bow; however, though,
A beau she never caught.

She writes "rite" "right," which must be wrong.
She doesn't sow, but sews.
She doesn't often close her eyes,
But always eyes her clothes.

Her hair is light, and heavy too;
Her clothes, though dark, are light:
And though at night she sits up late,
She never sees a knight.

She's twice fifteen—she's thirty too.
Her name, though here, is Nott,
And though 'tis Nott repeated here,
Her name is—you know what.

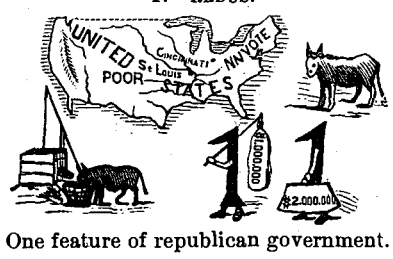
A Tribute to My Friend "Prince."

DEAR LITTLE FRIENDS: I want to tell you of a caller I had one evening last winter—there were two of them; one a gentleman, and one a beautiful Irish setter named Prince. It is of Prince I wish to tell you. Myself and little ones gave him a warm welcome, and as he came into the house we left the door open, and his master said to him, "Prince, shut the door." He walked gravely back, and, rising upon his hind feet, placed his fore paws against the door, gently pushing it to, shutting it so softly that I thought to hav seen him would hav been a much needed lesson to some little ones I hav known, to whom it seemed almost impossible to close a door without slamming it, even although they hav two well-trained hands, quick eyes, and a reasoning mind to guide them. He did many clever things for us, and it was all done with seeming cheerfulness and great dignity, proving to us that he knew nearly all we said to him. After he had done all he could to please us, he climbed into a chair and sat there, looking as kind and noble as it was possible for a dog to look. Since that evening I hav not seen him, but I will let his master tell you of his cruel fate in his own sorrowful words. I hope it will make you more kind to all living things. No doubt you all hav your pets, and I want you to resolve never to be harsh to them in any way. There are few things or objects in this world we need to fear, and none we should use with cruelty; even if we hav to take life, we can do it in the most painless and speedy way. The following tells the fate of Prince: "This is a sad day to me. I had a noble, true-hearted, loving friend, and some assassin has taken his life with poison. I hav had the charge and care of him since he was born, hav had lots of trouble and many trials with him, but hav always been more than paid by his faithful love and perfect trust in me. When I chided him his sorrow was always visible, and when I chastised him he would kiss my hand as soon as I would permit him to do so. He was always anxious to do my bidding, and would always obey my slightest wish as soon as he could understand it. He has shared my tent and bed in many a hunting trip; has waded swamps and marshes, swam rivers and lakes in fair weather and foul, in warm and ice-cold water, to bring in the game that fell to us—only too glad to do all this rough work to win one word of kindness from me. He was always happy when with me, and waiting and watching for me when I was away. He never gave me an unkind look, but his truthful, faithful, loving actions hav often reproved me for hasty words or actions in such a way as I shall remember through life. O my faithful, loving Prince! How could any human being find it in his heart to murder you! If it is unmanly to shed tears over such a death of such a friend, then I will plead a want of manhood. I could almost say in heaven itself I'd ask no more than just old Prince's welcome.

"My brown-eyed faithful friend,
No more will we wander together;
No more will the tender verdure bend
'Neath your step in all kinds of weather;
No more through boggy marshes,
No more through sunny dell,
Shall you and I tramp as in days now past,
In the sport we loved so well.
Rest, old comrade, your kind eyes veiled,
Your soft footsteps stilled, stirless, dumb;
Above your head may nestle the quail,
And the plumed pheasant strut and drum."

AUNT MAY.

Shocking!



Two young girls were late to their respectiv Sunday-schools, Baptist and Methodist. They dared not go in when the services were nearly over, so they wandered along until they came to a Universalist church. "Let us go in here," said one of the girls, whose name was Maria.

"Oh, horrors!" exclaimed Jane, her companion. "My father would nearly kill me if I should go in there—I'd rather by far go to the Catholic church."

"And why not go in here?" questioned Maria. "Why, they don't believe in a hell! and that's awful, you know, not to believe in a hell. My folks can't go such a religion as the Universalists', nohow."

Correspondence.

OTTUMWA, IA., Nov., 1886.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: To-night, as I sit alone, thinking of the great, vast army of men and women who inhabit the globe—of those who are endeavoring to bring humanity to a standard of truth, honor, and justice, and who are struggling day and night to accomplish the task of overthrowing the tottering temple of ignorance and superstition—there comes to my mind one who, by her faithful efforts, has gained the affection and good will of a large number of the youth of this glorious country; and that one is the conductor of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S Children's Corner.

Everywhere in the Liberal ranks we find noble men and women brushing from the intellectual storehouses the dust and cobwebs of priestcraft and ignorance, but few are the number who begin at the very foundation, and free the minds of the children from the destructiv ideas which are implanted in them by the vast majority of the mothers and teachers of to-day.

Your correspondent is eighteen years old, and is deeply interested in the work which you are conducting. For the past nine months I hav occupied a position as teacher in the public schools of this county, but in my efforts to discard the blasphemous old Bible, and teach science and truth in its stead, I brought upon myself the everlasting hatred of some of our God-loving directors, and hence am deprived of the opportunity of continuing in the profession which I love so well. What can giv one more pleasure than to assist in developing the minds of the rising generation, and fit them for those places which shall be made vacant when the great and learned of to-day are no more?

Even in my dreams I behold the bright, happy face of my former scholars, and oh, how I long to once again assist them in their studies, or teach the little brown hands to make the first written letters of the alphabet! Strange indeed are the chords of love which bind together the teacher and pupil, and when that chord is once formed, all attempts to break it will prove useless.

The letters in the Children's Corner from my dear little Freethought friends bring a great deal of pleasure to me, and I hope that they may grow on and on in intellectual beauty and unfoldment—that they may assist in exposing the frauds, vices, and crimes of that religious sect which, for the past eighteen hundred years has endeavored to imprison the great and noble women of all ages, and which, if it were not for the bright star of Freethought, would plunge into everlasting darkness the grandeur and beauty of nature and her laws, and would compel humanity to bow before a wicked and cruel monster whom the world never has looked and never will look upon. O truth! O justice! canst thou longer behold tyrannical priests and preachers stealing from the widow and orphan the last penny which should be given to those oppressed with misery and want?

O Liberalism! with thy broad and sweeping wing soaring amid the clouds of intellectual beauty, scatter the drops of love and mercy upon rich and poor alike—upon the young as well as the old—and forever swell the stream of truth, that when its sparkling waters overflow its rocky banks, they will bring desolation and ruin to the orthodox temples of ignorance, immorality, and injustice, and thus rescue the present generation, and those yet unborn, from another dark age of Christian sway.

If, instead of spending so much of our time and money in attempting to bring the more mature minds to a knowledge of truth, we rescue the children from the cruel hands of the church, we would achieve far better results. Realizing this fact, I shall ever endeavor to do my share in this great work, and so long as my hand has power to write, so long as my voice is capable of expressing the truths of science and Liberalism, just so long will there be an earnest and faithful worker in the Liberal ranks.

I hope you find your position as conductor of the Children's Corner a pleasant and profitable one.

May you continue long in the noble work you hav undertaken, may you hav a large number of willing friends to assist you in a time of need, and may the letters from the little boys and girls of Freethought grow more and more numerous as time passes on, that you may know you are awakening an interest in those for whose benefit you are laboring. Sincerely your friend,

KATIE KEHM.

[It givs us pleasure to receive so thoughtful and interesting a letter as the above, but we are sorry to learn that Katie has been debarred from pursuing a work for which she seems eminently qualified. Bigotry and intolerance are still foes to be met and vanquished, and we perfectly agree with our friend that our best results must be in training the young, a matter hitherto greatly neglected. We thank Katie for her good opinion and good wishes. Our labors with the children are pleasant and agreeable, and, if not largely remunerativ, financially, are nevertheless full of promis of fair fruitage by and by, in good lives and noble examples. We shall be glad to hear from our friend as often as she may care to write, and trust she may soon find employment in her chosen field of labor.—ED. C. C.]

KALAMAZOO, MICH., Nov. 20, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to you, for my father has been coaxing me to for quite a little time. If I see this letter in print, perhaps I may write you another letter. I go to school almost every day when we hav school. My teacher's name is Mrs. Mulholland, and she is very pleasant compared with the teacher I had last year. My studies at school are geography, grammar, arithmetic, reading, and spelling. We hav speaking every two weeks at our school, and sometimes reading of compositions. In two weeks from next week Friday, I hav to read a composition. We hav to compose it all ourselvs. I think my subject will be birds and their uses. We were examined the other day in reading, arithmetic, and language. Our class has not been examined in spelling or geography. In reading I passed 97; in language, 98; in arithmetic, 99. I passed the highest of anyone in the class, so far as I hav been examined this term. Well, for my first letter I think it plenty long. I will now close. From a true and loving friend,

NELLIE BEDEL.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Nov. 18, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I was very glad and proud at seeing my first letter in print, and so I thought I would write again. We are about to move into a new house. Pa is going to keep a variety store. If you should ever come to Buffalo you must come and see us. Wishing success to the Children's Corner, I remain, Your little friend, IDA A. BALLOU.

[If we should ever go to Buffalo to stop any length of time, we shall certainly call on Ida, as well as other good friends residing there.—ED. C. C.]

ATHENS, TEX., Nov. 14, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav been thinking of writing to you for some time, and neglected it. Professor Bell lectured here November 4th. He stayed with us while he was here. I wish he had stayed a week. I like him very much. Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER since the first copy. I always read the Children's Corner. I am going to school; there are three teachers and one hundred and thirty-six scholars. I study geography, history, spelling, arithmetic, and grammar. I hav heard two Liberal lecturers. I hav two sisters, one older and one younger than myself. I will bring my letter to a close for this time. Your sincere friend, MARTHA VAUGHAN.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Poetry.

The Fatherhood of God.

"Consistency, thou art a" stranger!

Whereas: The Declaration of our Independence reads:
"We are all created equal;" let us put it in our creeds,
"We believe in the fatherhood of God."

Whereas, the poor are poorer while the rich are waxing rich;
Whereas, the honest workingman is tumbled in the ditch;
To this list of all our grievances these holy words we hitch,
"We believe in the fatherhood of God."

Whereas, the proud monopolist gets all that he can get;
Whereas, he has machinery for getting, which as yet
Labor's honest competition doesn't alter—therefore let
All our voices drown the wailing of our children—we are met
To believe in the fatherhood of God.

"There are corn-ships in the offing, and we look with starving gaze;"
There is bread enough to feed God's hungry children—but it lays
In the granaries of the heartless, and the sun's increasing rays
Swell its volumes every season, swell the joyful note of praise
In the mansion of the wealthy, where the haughty master says,
"I believe in the fatherhood of God."

Yet, whereas, land, air, and water are sufficiently provided
To insure us all a living, were they equally divided;
And, whereas, the said division is too openly one-sided;
And the sacred trust of sonhood is too partially confided;
And, whereas, our wants with "luxury's contagion" hav collided;
Be it therefore, in convention, everlastingly decided,
"We believe in the fatherhood of God."

And, whereas, the sacred ballot is corrupted and controled
By a brute's intimidation and the yellow stain of gold;
And, whereas, an office-holder may be either bought or sold,
And the rich man's legislation drives the poor man in the cold;
And, whereas, his days are shortened by the toils that make him old,
And the gentle shepherd's golden-fleeced Merinos bar the fold
'Gainst the sheep whose wool is ragged—therefore be it often told,
"We believe in the fatherhood of God."

Whereas, motherhood is broken by the duties that enslave;
Whereas, daughterhood is ruined by the passions of a knave;
Whereas, manhood is confronted by more foes than it can brave;
Whereas, childhood in its weakness goes untimely to the grave;
Whereas, knighthood meets oppression and is strangled in its wave,
And the priesthood has determined whom it will and will not save;
"We believe in the fatherhood of God."

And, whereas, the strong are cruel and the weak must yield the way
Or be trampled under foot and kiss the heel that stamps the clay;
And, whereas, the wise are crafty, and, evading, disobey
Every law that stands between them and the poor on which they prey;
And, whereas, we all are orphans, seeking refuge where we may,
"We believe in the fatherhood of God."

We are cheated of our heritage—our father is a king;
We were all ordained as princes and we never rule a thing;
All the force of heaven's mandate is defeated by the ring;
Justice runs into a "corner"—therefore do we gladly sing,
"We believe in the fatherhood of God."

And, whereas, without reflection, it is sensible to hold
To a story that is true because it is so often told;
And, whereas, he was so careless in distributing our gold,
"We believe in the fatherhood of God."

What a golden ring of eloquence those tender words disclose,
And how peacefully we follow when the ring is in our nose!
"We believe in the fatherhood of God."

FRANK FELT.

AN Essex clergyman, says the Hartford Times, recently attempted to enter his house late at night, having arrived home from New York unexpectedly by boat, without the knowledge of his family. A barrel under the pantry offered him an easy mode of entering, and he sprang upon it. His feet had hardly touched the head before it caved in, and he found himself plunged in a bath of soft soap. To extricate himself from his unpleasant predicament, he was obliged to call for assistance, but before it was rendered he had a narrow escape from being shot for a burglar by a neighbor.

Book Notice.

A few days since I received "Spiritualism Sustained," by John R. Kelso, A.M.

It is executed in very neat style at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, 33 Clinton Place, New York.

The contents are as follows:

I. Spiritualism Sustained by the Bible.
II. Spiritualism Sustained by the Christian Church.
III. Spiritualism a Necessity in God's General Government.
IV. Spiritual Mediumship.
V. Objections to Spiritualism Answered.

In the first three lectures its author seeks to convert Christians to Spiritualism, under the plea that, if he can prove it taught in the Bible, by the church and God's economy, they are obligated to believe that it is essential now, and that modern Spiritualism is the same, and they hav no right to reject it, since they subscribe to it in the Bible. He alleges as a reason for so doing: "Many persons, on this subject, will receive nothing as evidence unless it comes from the Bible. For the benefit of this class of persons, therefore, I propose in my present lecture [the first] to prove by the Bible the truth of every phase of Spiritualism." He then goes on to state that he has written a book against the Bible and the God of the Bible, "in whose existence" he "has not one particle of faith," but he takes the Christians on their own ground, and, for argument's sake, premises that their fundamental beliefs are all true. Thus the entire first three lectures are based on a falsehood—1st, assuming the Bible true; 2d, the church as authority; 3d, God's general government requiring such a provision as Spiritualism. The author disbelieves the Bible, disbelieves church authority, and disbelieves in the existence of a God, and, while avowing all this, and much more, in his book approaches the Christian believer with this specious sophistry, as if he really believed it with him, and then appeals to his consistency, his truthfulness, his reverence, and his piety. Does he imagin such argument will carry one ounce of weight to any churchman? From the first advent of Spiritualism to the last quarter of a century, more than a whole decade, we, who were teachers of the facts of these phenomena, were constantly urging upon Christians the same considerations as has Colonel Kelso in his first three lectures. Then it had a tremendous effect, as we were all more or less partial believers in the Bible, the churches, the Christian religion, the existence of a God, and his superintendence over the laws of nature, but for one who denies his own argument, on the basis of its acknowledged falsity, to expect to frighten or convert his readers is folly in the extreme.

For instance, after repeatedly bringing forward his witnesses, in whom he has no confience, he triumphantly asserts, "I hav proved it [Spiritualism] by the unanimous testimony of all the fathers," etc., etc., when he has only proved that the fathers, whom he regards as liars, believed and taught it. I will impeach all his witnesses through himself; he does not believe them—admits he does not—but because the Christian professes to, he turns to the Christian, takes his Bible, his church, and his God wherewith to convict him, provided he rejects modern Spiritualism, on his version of his God and his Bible.

I guarantee that those three lectures will not convert to Spiritualism one Christian who understands that Colonel Kelso rejects his own reasoning. Of course, no antichristian non-Spiritualist will be attracted toward Spiritualism by religious theories, so only the Christian can be expected to be won through these lectures. His argument, based on false Bible premises, is much more likely to convert the Spiritualist and Infidel to Christianity than the Christian to Spiritualism. One would suppose, had he not told us to the contrary, that he was the greatest Bible-believer of them all, indorsing all the church dogmas (to overthrow them in the two succeeding lectures), so anxious is he to make the Christian see that his Bible teaches modern Spiritualism, which, even if it did, would no more prove its truth than does Genesis prove the earth flat and made in six days of twenty-four hours each. His method is very ingenious, but it is false even while he avows its object.

In Lecture IV., "Spiritual Mediumship," our author tells us that he "no longer acts as the mere attorney of Spiritualism," but fearlessly "attacks the testimony of the Bible, the church, or any other party," although he affirms, "In preceediug lectures I fully proved, by testimony which no believer in the Christian religion will dare reject, that spirits do exist and do communicate with men." Yes, in his last two lectures he attacks and disproves the validity of the very testimony that he used in the three former to prove Spiritualism, and then boasts nine times over (see pages 152-155) that by his own repudiated witnesses he has proved his case!

In treating this portion of his subject, Spiritual mediumship, he says: "I shall hav to take it for granted that you are all believers in what is usually termed 'the immortality of the soul,' and that consequently you are all believers also in that class of beings called spirits." Having thus taken for granted the two important postulates to be proved—immortality and spirit existence—he proceeds to "explain five methods of communication" involving "five phases of mediumship." As this explanation is designed expressly for those who believe in immortality and spirits, it is of no value to an unbeliever, and in vain I sought for one lucid, scientific reason, or the least evidence that spirits hav aught to do with the magnetisms, psychic force, or any of the phenomena adduced, a portion of which I know to be true, but reject the spiritual agency. The theories assumed are what we are waiting to see proved.

On page 187, under the head of "Inspiration, the last, and in some respects the highest, phase of spiritual mediumship," our author wanders into marriage, and says: "The magnetic or thought spheres of two persons, especially if they differ in sex, very frequently so unite that the thoughts and the emotions of one become the thoughts and the emotions of the other. . . . A man and a woman thus united are truly married without that miserable, meaningless mummery, the marriage ceremony of a priest." He continues at some length to expatiate on true and false marriage, stating what we all know, that "marriage existed long before priestly ceremonies were invented. . . . Marriage is no more dependent on the ceremony of a priest than is the union of oxygen and hydrogen in the formation of water."

That is true; no one need go before a priest; they can avoid the "ceremony of that meaningless mummery," if they chose, and still hav their marriage legal in the eyes of the law, by applying to a civil magistrate, where, in many of the states, no ceremony need to be performed, only the proper questions asked and responded to, with no "mummery," any more than in giving a deed, making a will, or any other civil contract. There seems to be great harping just at this particular time on a "priestly ceremony," when it is known, or should be, that the legality does not depend upon a priest or a ceremony, but upon state laws which, if not complied with, render the couple not legally married, the same as does non-compliance with any other law render the contract null and void. A priest, ceremony, or "miserable, meaningless mummery" is not essential, but entirely optional with the contracting parties and their friends. Why, then, adduce that as an obstacle to true marriage?

Excuse this digression, I did but follow the author of "Spiritualism Sustained."

Lecture V., "Objections to Spiritualism Answered," is "addressed principally to the members of the various denominations of the Christian churches," therefore has no weight with the heretic, scientist, or philosopher who rejects the Christian religion, or uses reason. Most of this argument is the same as we hav heard ever since the advent of modern Spiritualism, and is worthless for all convincing purposes.

But our author's arguments against the Bible, God, and religion, in his last two lectures, are excellent, and if Christians who read his book to gain a knowledge of Spiritualism are not so shocked at his fearless exposition of their Bible, God, church, and creed, as to throw away his truths on that subject, he may do them great good in opening their eyes to the monstrous lies they are now believing; but when Colonel Kelso claims the following, he makes a great mistake, for he has established no such thing, viz.: "In my previous lectures I not only fully established the genuinness of spiritual communications, but also clearly explained the principle on which they are made."

But the book is well worth its price for its sturdy blows against old theology, but signally fails, in my estimation, in sustaining Spiritualism, except as it appeals to a false religion for substantiation—a religion that the author in the same book ignores and condemns. Can he expect his argument on such a basis will hav any effect on the Christian, for it is to him it is addressed? And to the non-Bible believer must first be proved its authority and truthfulness before he can be reached through its portals.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

"SHOPPEL'S MODERN HOUSES" No. 3.

(Just Published, July 1, 1886) CONTAINS:

A colored frontispiece showing the modern style of painting.

A cardboard supplement, ingeniously drawn and colored, to supply all the necessary pieces for constructing a model house, with plain directions for putting them together.

While the supplement affords both old and young the greatest amusement, it is more than a toy. It is, in fact, a most practical lesson in Architecture; a perfect, scaled model of one of our most popular designs, so exact that it is useful to builders.

55 New Designs for Residences (cost varying from $500 to $15,000).
2 New Designs for Barns.
1 New Design for a Chapel.
Drawings and description of a model Kitchen (by Maria Parloa) and a perfect Cistern.
An Article on Villa Park Associations.

THE Grant Monument oring to revive interest $124,000 is now in hand.

VICE-PRESIDENT HOXIE of Gould's Missouri Pacific Railroad, is dead and buried.

HENRY M. STANLEY, the African explorer, is in New York. He will lecture.

IT is reported that the Fenian Brotherhood has retired O'Donovan Rossa as a leader.

THE jury disagreed in the case of McQuade, the "boodle" Alderman. He will be retried.

A. K. CUTTING, the Texas editor who came so near getting this country into a quarrel with Mexico, has taken the lecture field.

A LABORING man, of Minersville, Pa., has invented a car-brake that he claims will stop a freight train going thirty-five miles an hour in fifteen feet. He is offered $75,000 for his invention.

THERE is quite a scandal in Washington over the exposure of a scheme to hav all Congressmen dogged by the police, in order to obtain evidence of immorality against them, to be used to coerce legislation.

DANA CONWAY, a son of Moncure D. Conway, died in Brooklyn, Nov. 22d, aged 21.

IT is estimated that the revenue tax on oleomargarine will amount to $400,000 for the present month.

THE will of the late Chester A. Arthur has been filed. It is said the estate is valued at $100,000, and there are no public bequests.

CHARLESTON was again shaken by an earthquake on the 28th. The shock was not severe, but caused considerable consternation.

MISS SADIE ALLEN went through the Niagara rapids in a barrel last Sunday in company with Geo. Hazlett. Miss Allen is now prepared to enter a museum.

LEWIS THE LIGHT, a man who claims to be Jesus Christ, went into a Brooklyn church one day last week, and revealed himself to the congregation as a savior. He was ejected.

THE German Reichstag (legislature) was opened Nov. 25th, the minister of the interior reading the emperor's speech from the throne. The emperor expressed an intention of enlarging the German army.

THE Rev. John Salmon, pastor of a Toronto church, who is an unswerving advocate of the faith cure, has been obliged to resign because a majority of his congregation are not in accord with him in this belief.

LADY CAMPBELL, wife of Colin Campbell, a noble lord of England, is suing for a divorce. The charges and counter-charges reveal a bad state of morals among the aristocracy. Campbell is the son of the duke of Argyll.

MISS ROSE ELIZABETH CLEVELAND has written a narrativ poem of 400 lines, which will soon be published. It is called "The Dilemma of the Nineteenth Century," and treats of the woman question from the satirical point of view.

THE chief of the bureau of statistics at Washington reports upon the imports and exports of the United States for the year ending Oct. 31, 1886, as follows: The excess of merchandise exported over that imported is $144,235,239; gold and silver, excess of exports, $2,223,734.

SOME young men of this city, by way of a joke, told Louis Weiland, an upholsterer, that he had been nominated as candidate for the assembly, and induced him to contribute to campaign expenses. When Weiland learned that he had been fooled, he went away, leaving a note informing his family that he had committed suicide.

Odds and Ends.

A CHRISTMAS story—"I don't expect anything this year."

TIME flies! Oh, let somebody else time them; we are too busy.

MOST any young man would embrace religion—if it is contained in the heart of a pretty girl.

IT is very unhealthy for a growing boy to smoke tobacco—particularly if his father catches him at it.

WHY is the average undertaker liberal? Because when he gets a job he always sends for the bier.

A PHYSICIAN says: "If a child does not thrive on fresh milk, boil it." This is too severe. Why not spank it?

ADAM and Eve, according to the Post, were born on Oct. 28, 4004 B.C. Ground was broken for the earth in the spring of 4003.

THE rockers on a chair never stick out half so far behind at any other time as when a man is prowling around in the dark barefooted.

"WAITER, is this an old or a new herring that you brought me?" "Can't you tell?" "No." "Well, then, what difference does it make?"

A MADRID newspaper was seized five times within a week for slurs on the infant king. This is a free country, and who's afraid? The king of Spain is a sucker.

IN a recent issue of a contemporary is an article entitled, "How to pack a trunk." The best way to pack a trunk is to sit down in an easy chair and watch your wife do it.

"DID your former physician giv you a diagnosis, madam?" Mrs. A.: "No, doctor, he only gave me iron, but I'm willing to take one if you think it would do me any good."

A CHICAGO minister preached last Sunday on "What can I do to be saved?" This is very plaintiv and pathetic, but we are not able to suggest anything. Probably a hopeless case.

A YOUNG man out West stole money from the post-office in which he was employed to pay his wife's dressmaking bills. He didn't rob Peter to pay Paul, but he robbed the mail to pay the female.

CUSTOMER: "But aren't the trousers too long?" Tailor: "Too long? Dey is made to fit a man exzekly your size. If your legs happen to be a drifle short you must quarrel mit nature—not de tailor."

A BROOKLYN man was awakened in the night and told that his wife was dead. He turned over, drew the coverlet closer, pulled down his nightcap, and muttered, as he went to sleep again: "That's too bad. How grieved I shall be in the morning!"

BARNUM offers twenty thousand dollars for the skin of a sea-serpent, and a Harlem man is trying to hatch a sixty-foot snake from a jug of election whisky. He doesn't hav much trouble in growing the snake, but it puzzles him to keep the whisky from getting away.

MISSIONARY (from India): "Yes, dear young lady, I hav come to teach the American heathen the beauties of Buddhism." Fashionable miss: "Oh, we are not heathen. You mistake." "Indeed! Are you taught that in all things there is design, and that all things are ordered wisely?" "Oh, yes." "You amaze me. Tell me what birds were made for." "Birds! Why, to grow wings for hats, of course."

WHEN a Delaware man saw the Wm. E. Dodge statue at Sixth avenue and Broadway, he remarked to a friend: "That man must be honest. When we put 'em in the pillory down where I come from, we hav to stick their heads through a hole and fasten their hands. How long's he up for?"

IT is said that some of the Western railroads even control the religion along their lines. A new resident of Ellendale, Dakota, handed in a letter to one of the churches, and was asked, "Did you come by the Blank and Blank Railroad?" "No." "Do you patronize the company's elevator at this station?" "No." "Hav you signed a petition for lower freight rates?" "I hav." "Then you had better take back your letter and apply to the Baptist church, two blocks down and around the corner. That church hauls most everything by mule teams, while we stand in with the railroad."—Wall Street News.

THE HEATHEN GHOST'S LAMENT. (WITH APOLOGIES TO THE ANDOVER PROFESSORS.)

From all eternity predestined
By a stern, inflexible will,
To refuse to hear a message
Which is hidden from me still;
Though I couldn't hearken to it,
Since I never heard it preached,
And my destiny forbade it
Even had it to me reached;
Now, alas! I find my station
In a lake of endless fire,
Doomed to merciless damnation.
Tortures terrible and dire!

What's my crime I can't discover,
Though I've thought and thought it over,
Unless this be my fatal sin,
That ere the world did first begin,
And long before my own creation,
I studied not my future fate
Nor sought its rigor to abate
By pleading for annihilation!
But now, O woe and endless horror!
Too late to interpose demurrer,
My doom is sheol's burning vault—
I've let the case go by default.

Those men who hold the key of heaven,
Those ancient Andover professors,
In mercy hav their flat given
Worthy of a slave's oppressors!
Because we've heard of no probation
After death for soul of man,
In sheol you must keep your station
And get along as best you can.
But hark, grave men, nor seek to tell us
All the things you've never heard of;
Lest you, like me, be damned for doubting
Things you never dreamed a word of.

seems to me as if this life iderable portico of man's ex-ard, in new mysterious envie continued without end. I say, "seems to me," for the proof of it were hard to state by logic; it is the fruit of faith; begins to show itself with more and more decisivness the instant you hav dared to say,
Be it either way. But, on the whole, our conception of immortality depends on that of time, which latter is the deepest belonging to philosophy and the one perhaps wherein modern philosophy has earned its best triumph. Believe that properly there is no space and no time, how many contradictions become reconciled!—Carlyle's Note-book.
[NOTE.—It certainly demands an apology thus to direct the attention of the reader to a speculation so utterly silly and groundless. When a philosopher founds his speculation on the supposition "that there is no space and no time," it is high time for sober, serious truth seekers to giv him a wide berth. The only sensible part of the extract is where Carlyle tells us, as regards immortality, to "let it be either way." If we are immortal, we shall liv forever, and if the whole human machine—including body, soul, and spirit—is destined to be reduced to its elements, our belief or unbelief, our faith or our skepticism, will not change the fixed course of nature—not by the turning of a hair.—Hylax.]

ATHEISM leaves to man reason, philosophy, natural piety, laws, reputation, and everything that can serve to conduct him to virtue; but superstition destroys all these and erects itself into a tyranny over the understandings of men; hence, Atheism never disturbs the government, but renders man more clear-sighted, since he sees nothing beyond the boundaries of the present life.—Lord Bacon.

SINCE no man of common sense, when he pulls down his house for the purpose of rebuilding it, fails to provide himself with some shelter while the work is in progress, so, before demolishing the spacious, if not commodious, mansion of his old beliefs, Descartes thought it wise to equip himself with what he calls "une morale par provision" [a rule of guidance to serve in the mean time?], by which he resolved to govern his practical life until such time as he should be better instructed. The laws of this "provisional self-government" are embodied in four maxims, of which one binds our philosopher to submit himself to the laws and religion in which he was brought up; another, to act, on all those occasions which call for action, promptly and according to the best of his judgment, and to abide, without repining, by the result: a third rule is to seek happiness in limiting his desires, rather than in attempting to satisfy them; while the last is to make the search after truth the business of his life.—Huxley's Lay Sermons.

INFINIT punishment is infinit cruelty, endless injustice, immortal meanness. To worship an eternal jailer hardens, debases, and pollutes the soul. While there is one sad and breaking heart in the universe, no perfectly good being can be perfectly happy. Against the heartlessness of this doctrin every grand and generous soul should enter its solemn protest. I want no part in any heaven where the saved, the ransomed, the redeemed, drown with merry shouts the cries and sobs of hell—in which happiness forgets misery—where the tears of the lost increase laughter and deepen the dimples of joy. The idea of hell was born of ignorance, brutality, fear, cowardice, and revenge. This idea tends to show that our remote ancestors were the lowest beasts. Only from dens, lairs, and caves—only from mouths filled with fangs—only from hearts of fear and hatred—only from the conscience of hunger and lust—only from the lowest and most debased, would come this most cruel, heartless, and absurd of all dogmas.—R. G. Ingersoll.

CHRISTIANITY has dwarfed humanity by its mysticism. Every attempt of man to reconcile the things that are not seen with those which are has been thwarted by "the mystery of divine things." He was told that it was not designed for him to know "the hidden mysteries." It was blasphemous for him to attempt to look into the oracles of God. In short, it was sinful to seek explanations and insist upon evidence and the reasonableness of things. "Reasonableness had nothing to do with sacred mysteries."—W. S. Bell.

WHAT fear we then? What doubt we to incense
His utmost ire? which, to the hight enraged,
Will either quite consume us and reduce
To nothing this essential; happier far
Than miserable to hav eternal being!
Or, if our substance be indeed divine,
And cannot cease to be, we are at worst
On this side nothing.

CHRISTIAN UNITY.—THE AGREEMENT OF THE SECTS.

Notes and Clippings.

A NAUGATUCK saloon-keeper has just bought a church. His application for a license was objected to on the ground that his saloon would be too near the church. He did away with that objection by purchasing the church.

THE superior of the "Oblat Fathers," of Quebec, has officially notified the Knights of Labor in his province that unless they renounce the order they will not be allowed to participate in the sacrament. The indications are that many Knights will go sacramentless.

THE clergy of St. Louis advised all their customers not to go and hear the American Opera Company because the ballet is one of the attractions. We will wager a trifle, however, that every minister in the city who can sneak in unseen was found in the bald-headed row on the first night.

"How do you like that new minister of yours?" asked Deacon Snaggs of Elder Berry. "I'm afraid he's too powerful. We can't stand it." "How's that?" "Well, you see, he preached a trial sermon on salvation, and every unrepentant sinner in the audience came up in front and joined the church. So we engaged him. The next Sunday he preached on the duty of marriage, and every old bachelor and widower in the congregation hooked on to an old maid and was married before Saturday night. He got a $5 fee out of every couple. But the worst came last Sunday. He preached upon the duty of giving all to the Lord, and I hope I may never if two old deacons didn't sprain their backs carrying around the contribution baskets, they were so loaded down with silver. When the congregation was dismissed, it was just like leaving a faro bank—there wasn't a cent in the crowd. The house had all the money. We can't stand such eloquence."

RHODES CLEMENTS, a farmer living near Leavenworth, Kan., attended a revival meeting last week and was converted. On his way home in company with a religious lunatic, he developed violent insanity, killed his companion with a club, and when found had torn the dead man's heart from his body and was devouring it like a wild beast. He was overpowered and placed in an asylum. Two other men in the neighborhood hav since gone crazy owing to the prevailing religious excitement.

ARCHBISHOP WALSH, of Dublin, recently refused to take the oath upon a Protestant Testament, on the grounds that he did not believe in it, and his testimony was taken unsworn, but still, in the boasted free America, our attention has recently been called to a public school teacher who insisted on a Catholic child conforming to her ritual, the reading of the Protestant Bible, and the repeating of the Lord's Prayer, as the introduction to the day's work. Has not the Catholic child in the American public schools rights in this direction as well as the Catholic bishop in a Dublin Court?—Unity.

ACCORDING to Archdeacon Farrar "in India the English hav made one hundred drunkards for one Christian, and are girding the earth with drunkenness." But the archdeacon need not stop here. In China the English hav made two hundred opium smokers and eaters or one Christian, and are girding the earth with opium fumes. Every subject has its pessimistic side; and Christianity—nominal Christianity as involved in a Christianized civilization—is under heavy indictments, and despite what we hear about the morality of the nations in some quarters, matters are not mending. Quite the reverse.—Christian at Work.

THERE were temporarily relieved during the year 1885 in New York state over 60,000 persons at an expense of over $733,600. There were relieved and supported in town and county almshouses during the same time over 132,300 persons, at an expense of over $2,002,700; making a total of money paid out for the relief of this great army of nearly 200,000 people over $2,736,400. The number of insane being supported by public charity in this state, Oct. 1, 1885, was, 12,707. This is an increase since 1880 of 3,170. The current expenses for care of idiots was nearly $66,000; for the blind, nearly $110,000; in orphan asylums and homes for the friendless in this state, Oct. 1, 1885, there were nearly 30,000 persons, at an expense of $5,363,878.

IT is so very seldom that a minister of the gospel stands up for more liberty of speech than is sufficient to make a Protestant that the Rev. O. C. McCulloch, pastor of the largest congregation in Indianapolis, must hav a large credit mark for concluding a recent sermon by expressing the opinion that the trial of the Chicago Anarchists had been conducted unfairly, and that their conviction was unwarranted. In making the statement, he said that the matter had been preying on his mind for some time, and he had determined to express his views, although they would probably not be approved by any member of his congregation. He believed the Anarchists were entitled to a new trial. Mr. McCulloch was a collegiate classmate of the Rev. Samuel P. Putnam, ex-Congregational and ex-Unitarian preacher, at present the efficient and self-sacrificing secretary of the American Secular Union.

"WHAT we need in our church is less preaching of prohibition and more preaching of honesty," was the exclamation of a business man to a friend who took the vacant seat beside the speaker on a train from Connecticut into New York. This rather remarkable comment was the answer the friend received when he asked the business man what he had that jingled so in the heavy bag that was taken from the seat to make room. "This bag," continued the business man, "contains punched, clipped, and abased coins, and I am going to New York to sell the lot for what they will fetch. Oh, no. I didn't take them in my business, but in another way, in which I couldn't refuse them. You see I am treasurer of our church, and these dimes and nickels and other coin were put from time to time in the contribution box. When clipped and punched coin began to be refused they began to make their appearance in our boxes when the collections were taken up. I suppose we hav taken in a hundred dollars' worth of this coin at its face value. I am going to suggest to our minister that he stop preaching prohibition for a while and giv us a sermon on petty dishonesty. Our church isn't peculiar in this respect either. The treasurer of one of the other churches in town tells me that he is bothered in the same way."

The Fathers of Our Republic.

WASHINGTON.

Washington, in early life, held allegiance to the Church of England; Washington, in his maturer age, was connected with no church. Washington, the young Virginia planter, might, perhaps, with some degree of truthfulness, hav been denominated a Christian; Washington, the soldier, statesman, and sage, was not a Christian, but a Deist.

The present generation has derived its knowledge of this celebrated man chiefly from two biographers, Weems and Sparks. Both writers were clergymen, and both class him as a Christian. Weems's "Life of Washington," the delight of many an American boy, a work made up of historical facts, highly colored, and interwoven with traditional stories and anecdotes, has long since been discarded as an authority. Sparks's "Life of Washington" is a more reliable work. But, before accepting Sparks as an authority in this case, it may be well to remember the standpoint from which his claim is made. Sparks was a Unitarian—one who utterly rejects the dogmas of Bible inspiration and Christ's divinity, as understood by orthodox Christians; who defines Christianity as "one with the absolute religion of nature and reason," and who recognizes as a Christian every good man, regardless of his theological belief. Will the evangelical Christian accept this conception of Christianity as correct? I think not. If he cannot, then he cannot consistently urge the acceptance of a statement based upon it, and the testimony of Sparks falls to the ground.

In the political documents, correspondence, and other writings of Washington, few references to the prevailing religion of his day are found. In no instance has he expressed a disbelief in the Christian religion; neither can there be found in all his writings a single sentence that can with propriety be construed into an acknowledgment of its claims. Says the Catholic World: "In all the voluminous writings of General Washington the holy name of Jesus Christ is never once written." Once or twice he refers to Christianity in complimentary terms, but in these compliments there is nothing inconsistent with the conduct of a conscientious Deist. Religions, like their adherents, possess both good and bad qualities, and Christianity is no exception. While there is much in it deserving the strongest condemnation, there is also much that commands the respect and even challenges the admiration of Infidels. Occupying the position that Washington did, enjoying, as he did, the confidence and support of Christians, it was not unnatural that he should indulge in a few friendly allusions to their religious faith.

In his "Farewell Address," the last and best political paper he gave the public, the Christian religion is not once named. In this work he manifests the fondest solicitude for the future of his country. His sentences are crowded with words of warning and fatherly advice. But he does not seem to be impressed with the idea that the safety of the government or the happiness of the people depends upon Christianity. He recommends a cultivation of the religious sentiment, but evinces no partiality for the popular faith.

He was one of the leading spirits in molding our present form of government, presiding over the convention that framed our Constitution. His influence was very great, and the greatest deference was paid to his opinions. Had he desired it, he could undoubtedly hav had the government established upon a Christian foundation; and had he been a very zealous adherent of that faith, it is not unreasonable to suppose that he would hav done so, or at least hav favored some recognition of its claims in the Constitution. But he did not utter a word in its behalf.

Above his official signature as president of the United States appears this important declaration:

> The government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion (Treaty with Tripoli).

He further solemnly declares that "the United States is not a Christian nation any more than it is a Jewish or a Mohammedan nation," referring to it, of course, in a political, and not in a religious, sense.

Every child is familiar with the story of Washington praying at Valley Forge. The Peter Parleys who write historical romances and label them "school histories" hav repeated it as a historical fact. But it is false. It bears the stamp of fiction on its face, and is of itself sufficient to excite the suspicion that Washington was not a religious man. Unable to prove that he was in the habit of praying in public, unable to cite a single instance of his ever having uttered a prayer in his family, this pious tale was fabricated. Intelligent Christians are ashamed of it. The Rev. E. D. Neill, of the Episcopal church, whose father's uncle owned the building occupied by Washington at Valley Forge, thus writes:

> There is a story about Washington being found in the woods in winter-time in prayer by the owner of the house which he used as his headquarters at Valley Forge, which I would like to believe, if it were not so improbable, and if it had not been first put in print by the eccentric and not very accurate Episcopal minister, Rev. Morgan L. Weems. . . . With a capacious and comfortable house at his disposal, it is hardly possible that the shy, silent, cautious Washington should leave such retirement and enter the leafless woods, in the vicinity of the winter encampment of an army, and engage in audible prayer.

Referring to the same subject, Rev. Minot J. Savage, of Boston, in a recent sermon, says:

> The pictures that represent him on his knees in the winter forest at Valley Forge are even silly caricatures. Washington was, at least, not sentimental, and he had nothing about him of the pharisee that displays his religion at street corners or out in the woods in the sight of observers, or where his portrait could be taken by "our special artist."

Even admitting that he did offer prayer at Valley Forge, there is no evidence that he ever resorted to its use again. The language he used at Monmouth a few months later was not the language of prayer. And even were it true that he habitually prayed, this would not demonstrate his faith in Christianity, for Deists, many of them, pray.

A century ago, it was the custom of all classes, irrespectiv of their religious beliefs, to attend church. Washington, adhering to the custom, attended. But it was noticed that whenever the administration of the sacrament took place, instead of partaking of the Lord's Supper, as a good Christian would hav done, he invariably arose and retired. A certain minister, fearing that such conduct on the part of so distinguished a person would hav a dangerous influence, took occasion to offer a mild rebuke. Washington quietly observed that he would giv the reverend gentleman no further trouble, and thereafter, on communion days, he remained at home.

Bishop White, of Philadelphia, the most eminent divine of his age in America, and a contemporary and acquaintance of Washington, in his "Memoirs" says:

> I do not believe that any degree of recollection will bring to my mind any fact which would prove General Washington to hav been a believer in the Christian revelation further than as may be hoped from his constant attendance upon Christian worship, in connection with the general reserve of his character. . . . Although I was often in company with this great man, and had the honor of dining often at his table, I never heard anything from him that could manifest his opinion on the subject of religion.

This statement does not afford positiv proof of Washington's disbelief, but is certainly strong presumptiv evidence of its truth. It is hardly possible to suppose that he could hav been a believer and hav let his most intimate Christian associates remain in total ignorance of the fact. Bishop White indulges a faint hope that he may hav been; but this hope is simply based on his "constant attendance" at church, and when we consider how large a proportion of those who attend church are unbelievers, that many of our most radical Freethinkers are regular churchgoers, there are very small grounds, I think, upon which to indulge even a hope. But even this "constant attendance" on the part of Washington cannot be accepted without some qualification. For, while it is true that he often attended church, he was by no means a constant attendant. Not only did he uniformly absent himself on communion days, but the entries in his diary show that he remained away for several Sundays in succession, spending his time at home reading and writing, riding out into the country, or in visiting his friends.

The closing years of his life, save the last two, were passed in Philadelphia, he being then president of the United States. While there he attended the Episcopal church, of which the Rev. Dr. Abercrombie was rector. Dr. Abercrombie was intimately acquainted with him, and probably knew as much about his religious opinions as any person. Upon afterward being interrogated as to his illustrious auditor's religious views, his emphatic reply was,

"Sir, Washington was a Deist."

Washington rarely attended, as we hav seen, any church but the Episcopal; hence, if any denomination of Christians could claim him as an adherent, it was this one. Yet, here we hav two of its most distinguished representativs, the one not knowing what his belief was, the other disclaiming him and asserting that he was a Deist.

In 1831, the Rev. Dr. Willson, a noted Presbyterian divine, of Albany, N. Y., preached a sermon deploring the fact that the founders of our nation were, for the most part, Infidels—that, of the presidents, not one had professed a belief in Christianity. Of Washington he said:

> Washington was a man of valor and wisdom. He was esteemed by the whole world as a great and good man; but he was not a professing Christian.

The sermon appeared in the Albany daily Advertiser, and attracted the attention of Robert Dale Owen, then a young man. Mr. Owen called to see Dr. Willson in regard to the statement. When the object of his visit was announced, the doctor frankly remarked, "As I conceive that truth is truth, whether it be for us or against us, I will not conceal from you any information on this subject, even such as I hav not given to the public." He then proceeded to recount evidence he had gathered from personal friends of Washington, and other sources, which fully convinced Mr. Owen that the statement made in his sermon was true beyond a doubt. In conclusion Dr. Willson said:

> I hav perused every line that he [Washington] ever gave to the public, and I do not find one expression in which he pledges himself as a believer in Christianity. I think anyone who will candidly do as I hav done, will come to the conclusion that he was a Deist and nothing more.

Some years ago I received a letter from the Hon. A. B. Bradford, of Pennsylvania, relativ to this subject. Mr. Bradford was at one time a prominent clergyman in the Presbyterian church, and was appointed by President Lincoln consul to Japan. He says:

> I know Dr. Wilson personally, and hav entertained him at my house, on which occasion he said, in my hearing, what my relativ, the Rev. Dr. Ashbell Green, of Philadelphia, frequently told me in his study, viz., that during the time that Congress sat in that city, the clergy, suspecting from good evidence that Washington was not a believer in the Bible as a revelation from heaven, laid a plan to extort from him a confession, either pro or con, but that the plan failed. Dr. Green was chaplain to Congress during all the time of its sitting in Philadelphia; dined with the president on special invitation nearly every week; was well acquainted with him, and after he had been dead and gone many years, often said, in my hearing, though very sorrowfully, of course, that while Washington was very deferential to religion and its ceremonies, like nearly all the founders of the republic, he was not a Christian, but a Deist.

After Washington's death, Jefferson made the following entry in his journal:

> Dr. Rush told me that when the clergy addressed General Washington, on his departure from the government, it was observed in their consultation that he had never, on any occasion, said a word to the public which showed a belief in the Christian religion, and they thought they should so pen their address as to force him at length to disclose publicly whether he was a Christian or not. However, he observed, the old fox was too cunning for them. He answered every article of their address particularly, except that, which he passed over without notice (Jefferson's Works, vol. iv, p. 572).

Jefferson further says:

> I know that Gouverneur Morris, who claimed to be in his secrets, and believed himself to be so, has often told me that General Washington believed no more in that system [Christianity] than he did (Ibid).

Judge J. B. Stallo, now minister to Italy, in an argument before the Superior Court of Cincinnati, made use of these words:

> The men who assembled in Philadelphia to frame our Constitution were, many of them, imbued with the spirit of Freethought then prevalent. I am not without apprehension that this will be found to be true, to a certain extent, of George Washington—clarum et venerabile nomen—who presided in that convention; that when you turn to the reliable accounts of the rhetoricians, who hav seen fit to meddle with it, the suspicion will arise that he would hardly hav subscribed to any of the dogmatic creeds of the day.

The Rev. M. J. Savage says: "Those best qualified to testify tell us that he [Washington] was decidedly Liberal in his theology in his mature manhood; and we know he was not shocked by the teachings of Thomas Paine. That he trusted in God, believed in a providence that in some large way guided human destiny, is, doubtless, true; but that he was an evangelical Christian is almost certainly not true."

Theodore Parker, referring to Washington, writes: "Silence is a figure of speech, and in the latter years of his life I suppose his theological opinions were those of John Adams, Dr. Franklin, and Thomas Jefferson."

That during all the maturer years of his life Washington was a disbeliever in Christianity, the testimony that I hav adduced is, I think, irrefutable. Was he ever a Christian communicant? In early life he may hav been, but there is no evidence that he was. It is true that for a time he held the position of vestryman, but this, being merely a temporal office in the parish, did not necessitate his being a communicant, or even a believer in Christianity.

The "People's Library of Information" contains the following:

> The question has been raised as to whether any one of our presidents was a communicant in a Christian church? There is a tradition that Washington asked permission of a Presbyterian minister in New Jersey to unite in communion. But it is only a tradition. Washington was a vestryman in the Episcopal church. But that office required no more piety than it would to be mate of a ship. There is no account of his communing in Boston, or in New York, or Philadelphia, or elsewhere, during the Revolutionary struggle.

Early in the present century, the rector of the Episcopal church of Alexandria instituted an exhaustiv investigation for the purpose of discovering, if possible, some proof of Washington having been a communicant. Letters of inquiry were addressed to his relativs and friends. But his efforts were unsuccessful. He says: "I found no person who had ever communed with him."

The Rev. E. D. Neill, in the Episcopal Recorder, says:

> The president [Washington] was not a communicant, notwithstanding all the pretty stories to the contrary, and, after the close of the sermon on sacramental Sundays, had fallen into the habit of retiring from the church while his wife remained and communed.

Had Washington been a Christian it is reasonable to suppose that on his death-bed, at least, he would hav let fall from his lips some word revealing the fact, conscious as he was from the first that his sickness must prove fatal. We hav the certificate of Dr. Craik and Dr. Dick, the physicians who attended him during his last illness, and this shows that he made no recognition of Christ or Christianity. This is corroborated by the testimony of Washington's private secretary, Mr. Tobias Lear.

Robert Dale Owen says: "It is well known that the patriot on his death-bed sought none of the consolations of religion, and it has been confidently stated to me that he actually refused spiritual aid when it was proposed to send for a clergyman."

With the simple words, "I am not afraid to go," the hero of a dozen battle-fields surrendered.

Evolution and Spontaneous Generation.

When I made a brief criticism upon two points in Mr. Watts's interesting articles on "Evolution and Special Creation," I felt sure that my positions were correct, though well aware that his knowledge of the subject was much greater than mine. I hav read Mr. Watts's comments several times over, and it still looks to me exactly as it did before.

He says, "The evolution of the living from the non living must be a part of the great scheme." The "non-living" must be dead, and that the dead can evolve itself into the living seems to me a contradiction. Certainly, the "non-living" cannot form or enter into a scheme to suscitate itself. The terms "living," "non-living," and "scheme" would seem to be as unscientific as "spontaneous generation."

Mr. Watts inquires, "For, otherwise, how did the living originate?"

We might first ask where life originated, and the probable answer would be that life began in the open world, where all the forces and powers of nature were activ, not in a hermetically sealed receptacle, where all the conditions of life are carefully excluded. Organic life originated by evolution. The gradations from the inorganic to the organic are probably infinitesimal. There is probably no more prospect of our ever seeing the lowest and minutest organisms than there is of seeing the ultimate molecules of the substances of which they are composed. Organisms must originate in living, not in non-living, matter, and just so far as precautions are taken to prevent there being any possibility of living germs or sources of life in the substances experimented with, just so far it is rendered impossible that living organisms should be produced. Accordingly, Professor Tyndall, Pasteur, and others who have repeated all these experiments thousands of times, under "test" conditions, hav obtained no results. The method is unscientific. It claims to get the greatest results under the most unfavorable conditions. In fact, at the exact point where—if the experimenter has made no mistake—it has been rendered impossible that there should be any result whatever.

The experiments of Dr. Bastian and others can hav no bearing upon the original production of life, because they hav all been made upon infusions of the flesh or excretions of animals, or of turnips, hay, or some vegetable already in existence. All Dr. Bastian's experiments on "The Beginnings of Life"—if we admit his theory—would suggest is that the first organisms made their appearance in an infusion of beef or of turnips, and the question would still remain where the beef and turnips came from. No experiment has yet been made which givs the faintest intimation that organisms will appear in purely inorganic substances. Pasteur and Tyndall hav shown that fermentation and decomposition result from minute organisms and that these organisms are developed from germs which are floating in the air. Tyndall says: "Leeuwenhoek estimates the population of a single drop of stagnant water at 500,000,000; probably the population of a drop of our turbid infusion would be this many times multiplied." If these are the dimensions of the complete organisms, what must be the size of the germs from which they are evolved? And yet the whole theory of spontaneous generation depends, for verification, upon the supposition that Dr. Bastian succeeded, in his numerous experiments, in excluding every one of these germs and that yet organisms (evolved germs) appeared. Professor Tyndall and Pasteur hav repeated these experiments thousands of times, continuing them for years, and not in one instance, where atmospheric germs were excluded, was there a sign of putrefaction or of bacterial life, of which putrefaction is a result.

It is agreed, on both sides of this controversy, that so far as knowledge extends the germ theory is true. Mr. Watts admits that Pouchet found organisms in his tubes because (as Pasteur showed) he failed to exclude these atmospheric germs. What Pouchet's experiments contained was not evidence of spontaneous generation, but evidence that he had made a mistake; and yet Mr. Watts would seem to hold that some other man's probable mistakes, which hav not yet been exposed, are to be taken as evidence of spontaneous generation.

Professor Tyndall has done the same service for Dr. Bastian that Pasteur has for Pouchet. Let anyone of a logical and scientific turn of mind read Dr. Bastian's "Beginnings of Life" and then read Tyndall's "Floating Matter of the Air," and I think he will find about as much left in support of heterogenesis as there was left to support Spiritualism in last winter's experiments at Liberal—after the fire. The philosophical way is to let evolution cover the entire ground; to concede, on the most extended evidence, that the processes of nature are continuous and uniform, and not, as soon as we get as far as we can see at present, conclude that the continuity is broken and there has been a sudden jump out of the darkness. Every inference of that kind has been proved a mistake, as far as experiments hav proved anything, and there are oceans of room for more mistakes, and no prospect of a discovery.

The other proposition, that man is the last and highest of the animal creation, is simply a matter of fact. That man is now the highest no one questions. That he is the termination of the evolutional series to which he belongs and hence must hav been the last of that series is also true. The reason he is the highest is that he is capable of indefinit improvement without specific change, and that he has been on this earth, and advancing, so long that all other species of mammals which, in early Pliocene times, were his contemporaries, hav disappeared, and their descendants evolved into new species.

I contented myself with Professor Huxley's statement because he never overstates, and, if he is almost—if not quite—alone, as Mr. Watts thinks, it will probably be found that nearly all recent writers hav stated the case stronger than he has.

For instance, take this extract from Professor Fiske's "Excursions of an Evolutionist," pp. 32–34:

> Among the mammalia the first species that has continued to liv down to the present time—namely, the African hippopotamus, in the upper Pliocene strata of Auvergne. . . . Now, from the fact that of these Pliocene mammals, every one has long since become extinct except the hippopotamus, Mr. Dawkins proceeds to argue that it is not likely that man inhabited Europe at that period. The alleged instances, three in number, of the recurrence of human remains in Pliocene strata, he pronounces unsatisfactory. And he does not even mention the brilliant investigations of the Geological Survey of Portugal, which hav brought to light flint implements, of undoubted human workmanship, in great abundance in the Pliocene strata of that country, buried under 1,200 feet of superincumbent rock. These discoveries set forth by M. Bibeiro, in 1871, are cited by Professor Whitney as furnishing conclusiv evidence of the presence of man in Portugal during the Pliocene period. Professor Whitney has collected a great amount of evidence which seems to prove that man existed in California at an equally remote date. Now, it is perfectly clear that the human race must hav existed for a long time before it could become so widely dispersed over the earth as to occupy countries as distant from each other as California and Portugal. For the first appearance of man on the earth we must go, therefore, far back in the Pliocene period, at any rate, and if we are to find the missing link, the primordial stock of primates from which man has been derived, we must undoubtedly look for it in the Miocene.

It seems important that we should hav, as far as possible, a correct statement of what the theory of evolution really implies. You ask the first intelligent man you meet what he understands by Darwinism, and he will probably tell you it is the theory that man descended from a monkey. But what it does imply, is only that man, with the other primates, at a remote period, had a common ancestry. Man is not the termination of the animal kingdom as it exists now, but only of a particular branch or evolutional series, which diverged from the common stock millions of ages ago. There were higher apes in the Miocene than now. Retrogression is almost as conspicuous a fact in paleontological history as progression.

The Constitutional Right of Women to Vote.

The adoption of this Constitution of the United States as the fundamental law thereof placed all citizens on an equality before the law.

No privileged class is known to this instrument of justice. "This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of the land," but all laws enacted by Congress and the legislatures which do not accord with it shall be null and void.

Art. xiv, sec. 1, of this document says: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law."

Do our state laws admit that all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and the state wherein they reside? Yes.

If so, are women who are born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, citizens of the United States and the state wherein they reside? Yes.

Has any state a Constitutional right to make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of female citizens of the United States? Does this Constitution in any way debar woman suffrage? No.

Art. xiv, sec. 1, reads thus: "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

Does the Constitution of the United States giv any state the authority to make or enforce any law which shall deny or abridge the right of citizens of the United States to vote on account of sex? No.

Art. i, sec. 2, says: "The House of Representativs shall be chosen every second year by the people of the several states."

Does the word people here imply that the male portion shall do all the voting? No.

Art. iv, sec. 4, of this document says: "The United States shall guarantee to every state in this Union a republican form of government." Do we understand by this article that the representativs shall be elected by only half the people? No.

Does the Constitution of the United States deny any privileges or immunities to women that it concedes to men? Does it in any way guarantee the male citizens a legal right to legislate for the female citizens "in all cases whatsoever?" No.

Does the law of suffrage in the state constitutions acquiesce with the laws of suffrage in the United States Constitution? No.

If not, are the state laws of suffrage valid and binding? No.

Is not the word male in the state laws or suffrage erroneous and unconstitutional? Yes.

Does the Constitution of the United States need an amendment granting female suffrage any more than it needed an amendment granting male suffrage? It is the state constitutions that need an amendment, by canceling the word male, thereby making them acquiesce with the fundamental law that knows no privileged class. Is it exactly the fair thing to count us as persons when the representativs are apportioned among the several states? I think not. And is not this one-sided legislation only an assumed power? How can it be otherwise when there is not one article, section, clause, or word in all the Constitution of the United States that concedes to male citizens any privileges or immunities that it denies to female citizens?

This is the authority on which I demanded my right to vote at the general election in Clarinda, Iowa, November 2, 1886, and I was denied the privilege the United States Constitution givs me by a state law, and I will test the constitutionality of the case in the courts.

History teaches that old empires fell because their governors forgot to put justice into their governments. When a government falls for want of justice, it "falls, like Lucifer, never to hope again."

An ex-representativ told me that woman suffrage never could be established by litigation; that we had better spend our money in good literature on the subject. Surely, "a Daniel come to judgment; yea, a Daniel." Said representativ may hold his breath until the coming of the "second Daniel."

The opponents of female suffrage want us to content ourself writing for justice and begging for a legislativ corner, and the more we write and beg, the more they are pleased and amused, for they very well know we neither hav to beg nor assume, but demand the privileges and immunities that the Constitution of the United States givs us.

"Put justice into this government," is the cry of the "ninety and nine" to-day, and it will be done, for the majority will eventually rule, and the present injustice will fall, as did his satanic majesty, "never to hope again," and

> The night so dreary and dark and long
> At last shall the morning bring,
> And over the land the victor's song
> Of the ninety and nine shall ring.

Yours, for constitutional justice,

Clarinda, Ia. MRS. LIDA JOHNSON.

P.S.—We will be very grateful to any members of the bar who think this subject worthy of note if they will express their views on these questions through the columns of this paper. L. J.

A New Twist of Revelation.

The origin of man as described in Genesis having been published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will offer a theory of human destiny on this planet as described in the book of Revelation. We hav the figure of a scarlet beast with seven heads and ten horns, and of a woman who is named, in big letters, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth. It is explained that the seven heads are as many kings; probably the seven empires that hav dominated the civilized world and passed away. The beast will be the eighth, is of the seven, and his empire is yet to be established. It is well known to hav been the leading ambition of Peter the Great to establish just such an empire with Russian domination, and he transmitted that ambition to his successors, who as yet are heirs-at-law for the patrimony, with a reasonable prospect of winning. That appears to be the head and front of what is called "the Eastern question."

It is further explained that the ten horns represent ten kings; probably the ten nationalities that constituted the Roman empire, who had not then received their crowns, but hav since received them. These shall be of one mind; and shall giv their strength unto the beast and reign with him one hour, and in that brief space they shall annihilate the mother of harlots and make her desolate. In the description given of this figure, we are informed that "the merchants of the earth waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies;" otherwise, "through her fornications." All merchandise being private wealth, exchange is a necessity; and merchants wax rich through the profits of exchange. Therefor, there is nothing on this planet but private wealth that answers to this description of the mother of harlots. We are further informed that "the merchants of the earth shall weep over her; for no man buyeth their merchandise any more." Nevertheless, the people must hav merchandise, and, unless the empire of the beast is state feudalism, and will supply the people with merchandise, for their labor, without money and without price, they must buy of the merchants. What else than state feudalism can possibly lift the masses of Europe and Asia out of the poverty, misery, and degradation into which private wealth has plunged them, and is rapidly plunging the working people of America? Like cause should produce like effect everywhere, conditions being equal. How long will the Christian governments of Christian peoples permit and foster such an outrageous blasphemy?

We are further informed that when the empire of the beast is established, another movement will begin that is illustrated by the figure of a warrior on a white horse whose sword is in his mouth; which indicates that he will conquer by the force of truth and logic, that slays without shedding blood and kills to make alive. "The beast and false prophet [the church] will be taken and cast alive into the lake burning with fire and brimstone." Which simply indicates that the empire of the beast will be annihilated and nobody seriously hurt. The remnant will be slain with the sword that proceedeth out of the mouth of him who sitteth upon the white horse. Then comes the figure of the resurrection, and the chaining of the dragon, that old serpent, etc. The allusion to the "old serpent" should remind us of the garden of Eden and the forbidden fruit. If man died a physical death on the day that he transgressed, the human race should hav become extinct. Therefore, the fact that man yet livs on this planet, and has evidently "come to stay," is prima facie evidence that physical death has not passed upon the human race, nor is it likely to. But the dissolution of human brotherhood has passed upon the human race, and dissolution is death. That being the only death that has passed upon the race, the restoration of human brotherhood is the only resurrection that is promised or is possible. Therefore, the figure of a resurrection in Revelations can imply nothing else than the restoration of human brotherhood; and a brotherhood should logically require paternal government. It is generally admitted to be the inherent right and duty of parents to govern their families. The nation being but a community of families, those who hav an inherent right to govern the families, respectivly, should hav an inherent right to govern the nation collectivly. Placing the entire wealth of the nation in control of such a government will but place it in control of those who hav an inherent right to control it, and who will be the most likely to make an equitable disposition of it. That is Communism, and can only be realized by Nihilism; nevertheless, it is Bibleism.

J. A. TUTTLE.

The Liberal Club.

The man who has been using this column lately to spread abroad the proceedings of the Manhattan Liberal Club was unable to attend the 424th regular meeting of that body. In order, therefore, that whatever of value might transpire on the occasion in question should not be lost to the outside world, he made arrangements with the assistant editor of a well-known scientific journal to be present and take notes. The record seems to indicate that the aforesaid assistant editor was there, accompanied by his better half. Neither has since been seen, but some stray notes in a lady's handwriting, found on the secretary's table, hav fallen into the hands of the writer of these lines.

From the notes it appears that Miss Anna Johnson, secretary of the New York Labor Lyceum, read a paper on "The Law, Socialism, and Anarchy;" that Miss Johnson looked too nice for anything; that minutes of the previous meeting were read and accepted; that a good audience was present; and that the assistant editor aforesaid, instead of taking notes, went to call on a chum who lives near by, and did not return until near the close of the meeting. The law was so entangled with Socialism and Anarchy that it was difficult to discriminate one from the others.

Lawyer Searing thought it well that the lecture had been delivered, and closed his remarks by quoting from "A Midsummer Night's Dream." At or about the end of the quotation a cold snap set in which lasted up to the present writing, and which was emphasized by the first snow of the season.

Mr. Levering, a returned prodigal, who came back like morn new-risen on high noon, spoke briefly but eloquently.

Dr. Kinget had something to say of an interesting nature.

Mr. Sutherland addressed the meeting in his usual poetic and somewhat florescent style.

Mr. Wm. Boyd, an outsider, passed a series of observations upon the subject matter of Miss Johnson's paper.

Mrs. Leonard closed the debate, and the Chair announced that the card for December was the best one yet.

The lectures for the remainder of December will be as follows: 10th, "The Basic Law of Ownership," by Edward G. Clark, author of "Man's Birthright;" 17th, "The Coming Constitutional Convention. What ought and ought not to be done thereat," by Prof. Van Buren Denslow; 24th, "The Yule Tide Festival," program to be arranged by the club; 31st, "Commemoration of the Distinguished Dead of the Year," program to be arranged by the club.

A Talk With Friends.

The motiv power of Liberalism is entirely unlike that of Christianity. Christianity appeals to a God and Bible and the world to come; Liberalism appeals to simple humanity and justice. It can force nothing. Unless its organization is one of attraction, it will drop to pieces. There is no sovereign power to make all think alike or act in common. There is no Jehovah to guide, but reason only; and that which binds together is confidence in one another and in the cause.

Without confidence there can be no unity and no strength. It is as essential that we believe in one another as that we believe in the cause itself. If we work for our cause, we must work with those who to our minds represent the honor of that cause.

I hope that every friend will read the directors' report in regard to the transactions of the American Secular Union during the past year, so that they may fully realize the difficulties that hav been in the way, and see that, in spite of them all, progress has been made. They will discover, I think, a purpose for the common good, and an endeavor for the right. That report must remove every cause for suspicion that there has been other than earnest and honest effort. With confidence thus established, surely we can do better hereafter. We are no longer raw recruits, but a veteran corps. We hav become acquainted in adversity. If our numbers are less, those who remain know each other thoroughly, for we hav summered and wintered together, and no shock can break our ranks.

The secretary has not been made richer by this work, but pecuniarily poorer. He starts on the new year without a cent of money, or any guarantee. Moody trusts in God. The secretary of the Union does not. So far as God is concerned, he will undoubtedly starve to death. He believes, however, in Liberals and in Liberalism, and is richer than he was two years ago, in the friends he has met, in the signs of progress seen, in sympathy and labor with world-wide movements, and he regrets nothing.

Freethought in the state must triumph in order that all things else both good and beautiful may triumph. Truth is for progress, truth is for nobility, truth is for manhood, and with truth we stake our fortune. I believe in the Liberals of America, and the work they do will some day vindicate the grandeur of their convictions.

There has been some difference of opinion among friends as to the best method of work, but all differences will disappear when the nature of our work is thoroughly understood. The opposition of some to present methods is based upon the idea that the Liberals of the country are thoroughly organized, and therefore a home secretary is all that is needed to keep the machinery in motion by correspondence, distribution of pamphlets, etc. This will do for the churches, but it will not do for the Liberals, who are not as yet thoroughly organized, as the churches are. The Freethought of to-day is in a very uncrystallized condition. It flows in a thousand currents. Like the sea, it breaks in a million directions. Freethought is too mighty ever to be fully organized. It can never, like Christianity, become a church, an institution, a form. It will always be a spirit—chainless as the lightnings, and immeasurable as the sky and sea.

If it were not for political power, I should never think of a Freethought organizaaion. If there were perfect liberty in the world, there would be no need of organization. Each one then could liv his life, freely mingling and freely separating.

But what is political power? It is simply physical force, and this force to-day is allied with superstition, untruth, ignorance, and bigotry. Political power is tyranny to-day, and infringes upon personal liberty. Therefore we are compelled to organize in self-defense. The issue cannot be avoided. Self-respect commands us to do something. The Liberal who declares that under present circumstances there should be no organization for the maintenance of political rights, insults his own manhood. The Liberal who to-day says he has liberty enough is a most unworthy American. He is so used to servitude that he knows not that the fetters are on him. He is more contemptible than a Christian. He has more wisdom, but less integrity and conviction. The Liberal who to-day is not in favor of common effort for freedom is either the most selfish of men, or the most brutalized in his feeling, for he submits to slavery with the instincts and habits of a coward.

We must organize, for organized physical force is against us. All the philosophy we may hav, and music, and art, and poetry, and knowledge, and wealth, and leisure do not palliate this fact. To a certain extent, all men are political slaves. They may roll in wealth, and despise the church and minister, but the church and minister rule them, and if they hav not manhood to resist and help others to resist, then their manhood is rotten. The Freethinker who quietly submits to ecclesiastical domination through the power of the state is the most abject of serfs. He stultifies his conscience by the very enlightenment of his reason.

We must organize in behalf of liberty, and until liberty is achieved there must be no cessation of effort. The fact that Liberalism to-day is organized but to a small extent compels activ field work. The desired result can be attained only by the living voice. This is the supreme method of all reform as history attests. The platform is the mighty agency. No political party can win votes without this. After the speech comes with added influence the Freethought press. The speech, however, is that which agitates, arouses, and creates discussion, and fires the heart and brain as nothing else can. If the objects of the American Secular Union were simply philosophical, or literary, or scientific—merely to giv information or increase knowledge—then pamphlet distribution or letter correspondence might do, but the fundamental object of the Union is political. It is for political action, for change in the laws of the land. It is not an institution but a movement, and it is not for the giving of knowledge only, but for the creation of a specific impulse. It is to influence men to do something, as well as to think something. It is for practical energy as well as intellectual enlightenment. Therefore, to achieve its end, it must use the most activ and the most practical of all forces, the platform.

When this is understood there will be no question as to the best method of work. There is a positiv evil in society against which we must contend. There is an outrage and injustice to every man. There must be a reform in the government. There must be a change in the administrativ power of civilization. The American Secular Union fundamentally is a political party. It is not a philosophical or scientific association. Therefore, it must adopt those means by which a political party achieves its triumph. It must devote itself to field work; it must arouse and agitate. There must be coöperation. The strong must help the weak. There must be a national fraternity, for the Union deals with national issues; with what is fundamental and permanent in politics. Local organizations can effect but little in this direction without combination. There might be social and intellectual improvement of a high order by simply local societies; and, if social and intellectual improvement were all that is needed, then local societies might work independently. But when a political wrong is to be removed, both in state and national government, then there must be a combination of effort. The American Secular Union represents this combination of the friends of freedom throughout the land. If this Union ceases to be, it will be many years before there will be another organization to represent the same great purpose. If one, therefore, wishes to assert the dignity of his own rights, to be a free and equal citizen with all others in the exercise of his personal liberty, then he will stand by the American Secular Union. The Union cannot represent everything. There must be differentiation and specialty of work. But the work of the Union, narrow though it may seem to some, is of transcendent importance. If there is to be social harmony, humanitarian effort, a vast and splendid republic that shall bear the shield of justice to millions of people, and represent reason instead of bigotry, then indeed the work of the Union is of the noblest order. Freethought is the highest thought, the highest life in literature and art, and it is equally so in the state. Certainly every friend of progress, believing in universal as well as individual welfare, will do what he can for the attainment of the objects of the American Secular Union.

PROGRESS AND POVERTY.

Long before the usual time for the lecture, the rooms of the Chicago Secular Union were crowded last Sunday. Every seat was filled, a fringe of compact humanity sat around the rostrum, the aisles were lined, and clustered around the doors were late comers, whose looks of disgust plainly betokened deep despair and disappointment at being unable to find standing-room to hear the lecture of the evening. It was the greatest outpouring we ever had—a regular red-letter day for the Chicago Secular Union, and a deserved testimony of admiration and esteem for Mrs. A. M. Freeman, who was to repeat her brilliant review of Henry George's "Progress and Poverty." Her lecture bristles with profound logic, bravely and beautifully expressed in choicest language, delivered with a lucid finish and fervor born of intense conviction, coupled with all necessary study and cultivation. For one hour, without manuscript and without a flaw, she held her auditors in that stillness that permits of no interruption, that allows no word to be lost that escapes the speaker's lips, and whose eyes follow feverishly her every gesture, who seemed, for the time being, "drunk with delight." It was a supreme effort of a woman possessing sterling genius, as the rapturous applause at its conclusion amply testified. I will neither attempt to quote or synopsize it. That lecture must be heard to be appreciated.

I know no one in the West better able to judge of its literary beauties than our learned friend, Gen. M. M. Trumbull, who prefaced his criticism by this commendation of the lecturer:

> I am always delighted and instructed when I hear Mrs. Freeman lecture, and also somewhat ashamed—ashamed to know that people will still flock in crowds to hear the superstitious drivel that usually emanates from the pulpits and help to sustain them in their gorgeousness, while lectures of the quality we hav heard to-night are confined to one small society in this great city. Mrs. Freeman's voice should be heard in the largest hall in the city—aye, and beyond the city, too—for I believe I am quite within bounds when I say there is not, in this whole country, half a dozen women of equal genius."

Possibly the above is not the general's exact language, but that is the substance of his remarks, and in that opinion I most heartily concur.

It is Mrs. Freeman's intention shortly to activly enter the lecture field, and if she attains the success her years of gratuitous lecturing for Liberalism deserve, she will meet with unbounded enthusiasm and substantial encouragement.

ROUSING RESOLUTIONS.

Seven months ago, the controling element of district assembly 24, Knights of Labor, were a lot of Democratic office-holding or wire-pulling politicians, and their organ, at that time under their complete control, was The Knights of Labor. It vomited this sort of venom against the then untried Anarchists:

> Let it be understood by all the world that the Knights of Labor hav no affiliation, association, sympathy, or respect for the band of cowardly murderers, cutthroats, and robbers known as Anarchists, who sneak through the country like midnight assassins, stirring up the passions of ignorant foreigners, unfurling the red flag of Anarchy, and causing riot and bloodshed. Parsons, Spies, Fielden, Most, and their followers, sympathizers, aiders, and abettors should be summarily dealt with. They are entitled to no more consideration than wild beasts. The leaders are cowards and their followers are fools.
> Knights of Labor, boycott them. If any of the gang of scoundrels should by any means get access to our organization, expel them at once. Brand them as outlawed monsters. Do not even permit yourselvs to hold conversation with one of them. Treat them as they deserve to be treated, as human monstrosities.
> We are sure we voice the sentiment of the entire organization when we say and hope that Parsons, Spies, Most, Fielden, and the whole gang of outlaws be blotted from the surface of the earth.

They also recommended, with an eye single to sustaining their brother, Parsons, in his hour of trial, that "they [the Anarchists] should be hung first and tried afterward." This element hav persistently claimed that those who expressed sympathy for them or denounced the foul conspiracy to hang them represented but an insignificant faction. Let me say that that element no longer dominates district 24, and that an entire new deal has taken place in the office of The Knight of Labor, much to the credit of the paper. A joint meeting of district 24 and district 57, comprising four hundred delegates to the two districts in Cook county, and representing nearly twenty thousand members, met in joint session last Tuesday evening and adopted the following declaration almost unanimously:

> We believe that the verdict in the recent trial condemning seven men to death and sentencing one to fifteen years' imprisonment was an outrage upon common justice and an assault on free speech and the right of the people to peaceably assemble for the discussion of their grievances.

It does not pay to be too previous; these gentlemen were too sure they voiced the sentiment of the entire organization, but they are not likely ever to be asked to speak for the entire organization again. They hav been ignominiously sat down upon in every way. This does not prove that these twenty thousand members are Anarchists, for I will venture to assert that there are not fifty Anarchists among these twenty thousand members, nor more than two or three hundred Socialists. It is nothing but intelligence yielding to the unfolding of facts—facts which were attempted to be suppressed by the trial, and even that, with the garbled reports given, convinced thousands that those men were not guilty and must not be hung. It is safe to say that they will hav a new trial. If so, they will never, in my opinion, be convicted again.

KNIGHTS AND THE SACRAMENT.

Canadian advices say that the Oblat Fathers, in the lower province, refuse to giv the holy sacrament to any Knight of Labor. I am very glad of it. Any man that wants a sacrament will never be, while in that state of mind, any good to a labor organization. He could get a great deal more good from an ordinary free lunch. This priest ridiculed with some justification the idea that the order was a mutual benefit society, saying that while one officer got five thousand dollars a year salary, it looked as though the officers alone were benefited. Two wrongs do not make one right, but I think I hav heard of one officer of a Catholic society benefiting to the extent of about five million dollars out of the members of his order.

Nevertheless, it is about time the members of the order of Knights of Labor, who hav any manhood, to make themselvs felt in opposition to the policy of its chief executiv in surrendering its secrets to the representativs of dogmatic creeds and mildewed superstitions for their approval or disapproval. If Cardinal Gibbons was a member he might, with propriety, be consulted; but then his opinion would be worth no more than that of any other member. Will Brother Powderly be consistent enough to recommend the presentation of the rules of the order to the representativs of the Protestant denominations? And, to be above suspicion of sectarianism, he might drop around to consult Colonel Ingersoll, the intellectual athlete, who would soon knock out of the program any suspicion of a personal deity.

But when the order confesses that it has not brains enough within itself to make its own laws, it is high time for it to change its officers—or die. An organization for the advancement of labor should put little trust in a church whose chief boast is that it "never changes." Cardinal Manning ought to be authority on the attitude of the Roman church. The New York Tablet, of Oct. 9, 1864, published a sermon of his when archbishop of Westminster, in which he delivered himself of this insolent utterance:

> I [speaking for the pontiff] acknowledge no civil power; I claim to be the subject of no prince, and I claim more than this—I claim to be the supreme judge and director of the consciences of men, of the peasant who tills the field, and of the prince who sits upon the throne; of the household that livs in the shade of privacy, and the legislator who makes laws for kingdoms. I am the sole, last, supreme judge of what is right and wrong.

When Catholicism obtains control we shall need neither courts nor legislatures. The priest will be primate, judge, and executioner. E. A. STEVENS.

Our London Letter.

A report just published by the commissioners of prisons shows that whereas in 1878 there were 20,833 prisoners in our jails, there are now only about 16,500, the population having increased by three to four millions. It is stated that the prison chaplains consider this considerable diminution is largely due to the Education act. Surely such a fact as the above should be sufficient to convince any one of the superiority of secular education over ignorance and superstition. Christianity has had nearly nineteen centuries to practice its principles, and compulsory education not so many years; the former has continually multiplied crimes and criminals; the latter, though only in its infancy, has decreased these to an enormous extent. Yet, in the face of this, there are still large numbers of people who hav the assurance to affirm that Christianity is the only civiliizing and beneficial influence in existence. At the time of the passing of the School Board act, it was declared by the majority of the clergy and their dupes that such a law would increase crime to an alarming extent, more particularly forgery; but as it is now found that such is not the case, and that the consequences hav been exactly the reverse, the same people are boasting that they hav always been friends of general education, and did all they could to influence the legislation in its favor. So far hav these assertions been believed that several clergymen hav been elected to sit on the Board, with the natural result that, while pretending to help on the cause, they are in reality doing all in their power to hinder it. The Secular party will hav still to fight hard before they succeed in getting what they require, viz., a free, compulsory, and secular education, not only in name, but in reality.

The correspondence published in the papers respecting the transfer of a married woman from the Protestant to the Roman Catholic church without the knowledge or consent of her husband caused very little excitement, although efforts were made to fan the flame of controversy on the subject. A great deal was attempted to be made of the fact that the new acquisition to the "Scarlet Woman" was now and again closeted for some time with the priest who did the business, but as this thing is of such common occurrence, it did not apparently surprise anybody. To the Freethinker the distinction between the two sects is so small that it is scarcely worth noticing. The chief point in the whole affair is the indignation of the lord and master, in that his property should be tampered with, and that the living chattel should hav dared to presume to be saved in any other way than the owner wished or ordered.

Although fresh Christian journals are frequently being brought into existence, I should think it must be a tremendous struggle for some of them to exist, or they would scarcely hav to write to the promoters of new companies, good and bad—more particularly the latter—stating that on receipt of ten guineas and a copy of the prospectus, a leader would appear in praise of the undertaking, in addition to a conspicuous advertisment. This little dodge would not take in people with any commercial knowledge, but as these papers mostly circulate in the provinces, it is easy to see how many pious people with small capital would be induced to speculate and lose their little all in consequence of such a nefarious practice. On the other hand, it may be that the editor should be applauded for doing his best to carry out (on other people) the saying attributed to the carpenter's son: "Blessed be ye poor," and if thereby he is insuring them a future great reward, let blessings rather than cursings be showered on his head. Washington's Religion.

As supplementary to Mr. Remsburg's consideration of George Washington's religious views, it may be timely to reprint the following correspondence from a memoir of Bishop White, by Dr. Willson, of Philadelphia, 1839, page 196:

Colonel Mercer to Bishop White.

. . . . I hav a desire, my dear sir, to know whether General Washington was a communicant of the Protestant Episcopal church, or whether he occasionally went to the communion only, or if ever he did so at all. . . . No authority can be so authentic and complete as yours on this point.

Bishop White to Colonel Mercer.

"PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 15, 1835.

DEAR SIR: In regard to the subject of your inquiry, truth requires me to say that General Washington never received the communion in the churches of which I am the parochial minister. . . . I hav been written to by many on that point, and hav been obliged to answer them as I now do you. I am respectfully,

Your humble servant, WILLIAM WHITE.

Again, by the bishop, in the same book:

The father of our country, whenever in Philadelphia, attended Christ church. His behavior was always serious and attentiv. But on the point of kneeling during the service, I owe it to truth to say that I never saw him in that attitude. Although I was often in company with this great man, and had the honor of dining often at his table. I never heard anything from him that could manifest his opinions on the subject of religion. WILLIAM WHITE.

The Picture Incomplete.

From the Kansas Blade.

Last week's TRUTH SEEKER had a very impressiv "Thanksgiving Sermon." It was a cut of a cabin home, of a husband and wife and two children. There is a stove, but no fire; a teakettle, but no steam escaping from it; an empty teapot, a soup-bowl and spoon, but no soup; a rickety old table leans against the wall; the wife sits in an old-fashioned chair, and another chair rests against the wall for support; one child is barefooted, and the other child and the wife hav on the cheapest of stogies; the clock in the corner marks ten minutes of twelve, and the family in tears, saying: "No work, no fuel, no food! What hav we to be thankful for?"

The picture is true to the "home life" of many thousands of families on "Thanksgiving day."

To hav made it more impressiv, there should hav been a million-dollar church edifice and a swarm of people entering it dressed in silks, satins, and the finest of broadcloth, al sparkling with diamonds and jewels. A beggar by the roadside with extended palms and a lofty scorn depicted upon the countenances of "God's elect" would hav added truth and effect to the scene.

The man who has nothing to do but clip his coupons, or the trader whose yearly profits exceed his expenses; the office holder whose yearly salary exceeds the farmer's lifetime profits; the manufacturer, who builds a palace from a single year's income from the toil of ten thousand drudges, may, with indecent propriety, "thank God for benefits received;" but the farmer, who has toiled a year, lived frugally, denied himself all but barely the commonest amusements; the laborer, whose income, in spite of the practice of the most rigid economy, is required for each day's support; the hundreds of still worse unfortunate—sick, disabled, heartbroken—hav nothing to "thank God" for, and it is a mockery and insult to suggest that he "thank" him or anyone else.

H. W. BEECHER says that the Jews and Samaritans were both very religious. "That they were pious is evident from the fact that they hated each other without intermission. Most hatreds," continues the preacher, "hav some passions behind them; religious hatred has conscience behind it; and when a man's conscience sets him to hate his brother there is no morning to that night." Yet Mr. Beecher is presumably religious.

Man and Beast.

THE COMMON LOT.

Once, in the flight of ages past,
  There lived a man; and who was he?
Mortal, howe'er thy lot be cast,
  That man resembles thee.

Unknown the region of his birth,
  The land in which he died unknown,
His name has perished from the earth,
  This truth survives alone:

That joy, and grief, and hope, and fear
  Alternate triumphed in his breast,
His bliss and woe—a smile, a tear!
  Oblivion hides the rest.

The bounding pulse, the languid limb,
  The changing spirit's rise and fall,
We know that these were felt by him,
  For these are felt by all.

He suffered—but his pangs are o'er;
  Enjoyed—but his delights are fled;
Had friends—his friends are now no more;
  And foes—his foes are dead.

He loved—but whom he loved the grave
  Hath lost in its unconscious womb.
Oh, she was fair! but naught could save
  Her beauty from the tomb.

He saw whatever thou hast seen,
  Encountered all that troubles thee,
He was whatever thou hast been,
  He is what thou shalt be.

The rolling seasons, day and night,
  Sun, moon, and stars, the earth and main,
Erewhile his portion, life and light,
  To him exist in vain.

The clouds and sunbeams, o'er his eye
  That once their shades and glory threw,
Hav left in yonder silent sky
  No vestige where they flew.

The annals of the human race,
  Their ruins, since the world began,
Of him afford no other trace
  Than this—there lived a man.—Montgomery.

Man is an intelligent animal. He is sometimes spoken of as a rational being. Theologically, he is called a living soul.

He comes into the world with no knowledge or remembrance of a former existence, and he leaves it against his will and consent. As a rocket sent up into the higher atmosphere, he meets resistance at every step, and when the vital force of his nature is consumed he falls to the earth a useless mass of decaying matter, and his name and path are soon forgotten.

Although the life of the individual is of but short duration, yet he has pleasure, comfort, joy, and, at times, ecstatic delight.

He also experiences pain, sorrow, desolation, and want. He is the most important thing in the world—to himself. He is often the least important to everyone else. He is at times a messenger of joy and happiness to his friends and countrymen. At other times he is a friend of strife, hate, and destruction to them. He acts and is acted upon by everything that surrounds him. Physically and intellectually, he is circumscribed in power and influence by education, shortness of life, and many other circumstances. In thought and aspiration his mind is unlimited by time, space, or condition in life.

In his mind's eye, although but a stable-boy, he sees himself elevated to the highest position in the gift of his countrymen. With that eye he looks out into space far beyond the scope of the most powerful instrument it is possible to construct, and no microscope will ever be invented that can reveal the ethereal forms his mind is conscious of having seen. And yet he is accounted, by those who hav used him as a football, as only a moving clod, or animated dust He has eyes and sees not, ears and hears not, and reason and yet cannot comprehend his own meanness, hypocrisy, cowardice, and mental servility. This is a picture of man as we look at him from a philosophical standpoint.

Now, let us look at the soulless brute, with whom it is claimed that man has no hereditary connection. In what does man differ from the beasts of the forest the insects, and birds of the air, the reptils of the earth, and the fishes of the waters? They can feel, hear, see, smell, and taste with more acuteness; they can distinguish power and capacity, color, form, and quality in everything that ministers to their wants or that can injure or destroy them. They hav reason, memory, and will power. In their process of reasoning, those that hav the greatest thinking power decide a question slowly, and those that hav the least thinking power decide a question quicker than a flash of lightning. They make war individually and collectivly, as two men, or the armies of two nations. They play, sing, caress each other, and enjoy companionship. Many of them labor from early dawn until evening's twilight. Many of them are loafers, who bask in the sun or sleep in the shade until hunger compels them to look for something to eat. Many are also provident in their habits; they harvest fruit and nuts and store them away for winter use. Without instruments they cut down trees, build bridges, houses, and cities. They spin, weave, and construct marine walls and islands. They hav social habits, love of kind and kindred, and sympathy for the injured and helpless. They can love and protect a friend, resent an insult, and hate an enemy. They can rejoice and express their joy and happiness, and be touched with sorrow in the presence of the dead. In what, then, is man greater than that which he calls an animal? It is not necessary to ask if he can change the order of the heavens in order to demonstrate that he is limited in physical and intellectual power. No, we do not need to compare man to the eternal, world-constructing, life-producing power manifest in the operations of nature to show how very feeble he is in some respects. Let us compare him to some of the animal forms he is familiar with. Can he dig up the earth with his nose, as a hog? Cut down trees with his teeth, as a beaver? Make honey, as a bee? Spin from his own body a thread, as a silkworm? Spin a thread and weave a net, as a spider? Build a hinged box from the product of his own stomach, as a clam? Propel himself against the current of a rapidly running stream, as a trout? Mount the air and contend successfully with the stormy gale, as a bird? The structural form and specific capacity of each of these was given to it by the environments of its ancestors. The lives of their immediate ancestors were preserved by being able to accommodate themselvs to their surroundings. In their efforts to sustain life, the hog became a plowman; the beaver a wood-feller and mason; the bee a botanist and manufacturer, and the spider a weaver and spinner. Insects, birds, and beasts became carpenters, masons, architects, artists, and musicians. In fact, nearly every art, even the art of government, is exhibited in the homes and haunts of the various forms of insect life. Therefore, it is clearly manifest that man, with all the cunning of his hands, the keenness of his senses, the genius of his mind, the power and capacity of his muscles, and the so-called divinity of his soul, can but partially imitate that which he usually considers nothing but a worthless insect or a dirty beast. In what is man greater than the animal? In special degrees of sentiment he is greater; in genius and power of intellect he is greater; in his hand and foot he is superior to all animals. But it was the necessities of his animal ancestors which gave to him that hand and foot. And these hands and feet, with all their marvelous capacity, hav developed the brain and body and placed man in the position which he now occupies as lord and master of the earth. The same character of circumstances which gave a hoof to the horse, gave to man a foot with a muscular lever which has enabled him to maintain an upright position and to travel to every part of the earth. If the animal ancestors of man, any time before the ape type had become fixed in form, had been compelled by force of circumstances to make the sand or rocky deserts of the earth their permanent abode, they would now hav feet like horses, cows, camels, or ostriches. And if our apish ancestor had continued to dwell forever in the forests of the world, an ape he still would be and nothing more.

Because he sought safety at the sea-shore from the jaws of fierce carnivorous beasts, where he was compelled to liv or subsist on marine animals principally, and, having no trees to climb, was compelled to stay on the ground continually—these were the necessary circumstances to bring about a full development of the foot, a shortening of the arms, and the maintenance of an upright position. And the ape-like man, or man-like ape, who first put a point on a stick with a sharp shell or stone or with his teeth, to use in killing fish or other marine or amphibious animals, took the first step, and performed the first act, in the great drama of the gradual development of that inventiv genius which has transformed the earth from a menagerie of wild beasts, and boundless, to a garden of pleasure, and a living monument of human glory.

But it is claimed that all this evidence of human glory is but the reflex of the divine spark which is contained in the human soul. This is but the mere statement of men who hav secured reverence, distinction, and credibility through the ignorance, credulity, and superstitious fear of the great mass of mankind. There is no tangible evidence of its truth. If the divine spark is contained in the human body, or any distinct part of it, that spark must hav been transmitted to us through our animal ancestors, not by any special act, human or divine. Therefore, if a human being has a soul, so has an elephant, an ape, a dog, a horse, a parrot, a wasp, a flea, a maggot. In fact, everything which contains either life or the potential elements of life has a soul if man has one.

What proof hav we of this? The proofs of it are that in our appetites, senses, propensities, sentiments, and aspirations we are purely animal. If young animals only know enough to make an effort to get something to satisfy their hunger, does an infant know as much?

If an animal can taste, feel, hear, see, and smell with his senses, can any human being do more? No; the powers of his senses are weak and almost impotent when compared to those of many in the animal kingdom.

In all the propensities and passions, how much greater is man than the brute? If the tiger and other carnivorous animals will destroy life to appease their hunger, man also will destroy even human life for the same purpose—yes, he will destroy human life for a mere insult, or to get possession of a small amount of money or property. He will kill his fellow-man for a mere difference of opinion. Every organized war that has taken place in the world is a demonstration of the fact that man is as bloodthirsty, as savage, and as inconsiderate of the sufferings of the wounded, the tears and sorrowful bereavement of fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, wives, and children, as the most ferocious brute in the animal kingdom. There is no form of low cunning, duplicity, fraudulency, or treachery that any animal was ever addicted to that man has not only equaled, but surpassed him in. And even in the higher sentiments, such as love, friendship, fidelity, care of the young and helpless, self-sacrifice, and honesty, man is not the superior of some animals. Man owes or is indebted to his animal ancestors for his mechanical genius. From the ape he has received the faculty of imitation. From the ape also he has received the hand which has enabled him to perform the actions and mechanical labors of other animals, and without which his faculty of imitation would not hav been of any more use to him than it is to the parrot.

Now, let us see what this power of imitation has done for him. If he cuts down trees for the purpose of building a house or a bridge, it is because he first saw a beaver do that kind of work. If he builds himself a hut, it is because he saw insects and birds employed at such labor. He merely constructed a larger domicil, on the same principle, in the same style, and of the same material. Has he made a net to catch fish or anything else with, it is because he first saw a spider weave a net and catch flies and other insects. If it had not been for the spider, it is doubtful if the human family would ever hav been able to discover the principle on which the material was fabricated from which our garments are made. If man had never seen a clam, it is highly probable that he would never know the use of a hinge. He even besmeared his face and body, to try to make himself look like a tiger, a leopard, a bird, and a butterfly. It might not be out of place to ask if there are not just a few highly civilized and very religious people living at the present day whose devouring aspiration seems to be to appear in public with a complexion as fair as a lily or as sweet and red as a rose. But to the point. It appears that man's most useful teachers and inspirers were the animals that surrounded him. If they sang and made delighful music, that suggested and he imitated. If they built houses, or in any other manner employed themselvs at any kind of useful labor, he merely tried to imitate their work. Wherever man is found in his primitiv home, if nature there is poor in vocal bird and constructing animal, there also is man poverty-stricken in voice and in mechanical taste. Wherever nature was rich, strong, and beautiful, there has man been found in full harmony with his surroundings.

But it is claimed that man has aspirations which could not be derived from any animal heirloom. This claim is not valid. Man is an epitome of all life that has existed on this earth. He is the most perfect conglomerate structure in the world. His desires, hopes, and aspirations spring from the complex constituency who hav deposited in his nature their wants and the fruit of all their efforts. Therefore, our efforts, hopes, and aspirations are but the manifestations of the demands of the animals of whom we are constructed. In other words, it is to satisfy the demands of all the species of animals who hav added their character and modes of action in the building up of the human structure that every effort, hope, and aspiration of the heart and brain has been directed, felt, and expressed. The insects and animals who lay up provisions for the winter season hav transmitted to us the desire to do the same thing. The animals who make no attempt to provide for winter hav also transmitted to us the inclination to spend as we go, and let the winter take care of itself.

Our desire to be upon the water and to plunge into the foaming breakers comes from the fish who still livs within us. The desire to gaze upon beautiful colors has been transmitted to us from insect and bird. Our desire to liv to a great age comes to us from bird, fish, and quadruped, noted examples of which are the parrot, elephant, and whale. If man is vain, or if he desires to receive applause and commendation from his fellow-man, or the approval of posterity, that desire has been transmitted to him from nearly everything in the animal kingdom. If he is friendly, benevolent, and self-sacrificing, it is because the bird and dog hav bequeathed those qualities to him. Is he a reasoner? So is a parrot, a fox, a dog, a monkey, and an elephant.

Can he imitate sounds with his voice? So can the mocking-bird and parrot.

Can he imitate the passions, pathological conditions and the sportiv and social actions of man and beast? So can a chimpanzee?

The carrier pigeon who cleaves the air with its wing and glides through space with the velocitv of a descending meteor has transmitted to us the desire to follow his example. To fulfil this desire and aspiration, man has utilized the horse, the steamboat, the railroad car, the balloon, and even the telegraph. It is only in the telegraph that man has outstripped the speed of the bird. The aspiration to soar up above the din, smoke, and impure atmosphere of thronging cities and to be alone among the gilded clouds in the pure expanse of heaven has been transmitted to us by the singing, soaring bird. This aspiration is beautifully expressed in the following lines of Shelley's "Skylark:"

TO A SKYLARK.

Hail to thee, blithe spirit!
Bird thou never wert,
That from heaven, or near it,
Pourest thy full heart
In profuse strains of unpremeditated art.

Higher still and higher
From the earth thou springest
Like a cloud of fire;
The blue deep thou wingest
And singing still dost soar, and soaring ever singest.

. . . . . .

The pale purple even Melts around thy flight;
Like a star of heaven,
In the broad daylight
Thou art unseen, but yet I hear thy shrill delight.

. . . . . .

Teach me half the gladness
That thy brain must know,
Such harmonious madness
From my lips would flow,
The world should listen then, as I am listening now.

By a careful examination of every thing contained in these premises we must arrive at the conviction that no supernatural power or spiritual agent ever infused anything into the mind of any human being. If man has had a divine teacher, that divine teacher has never authorized anyone to speak for him. If there be an ever-living and all-pervading intelligence in the universe, that intelligence has manifested its genius, power, and capacity to mankind through his natural teachers—the sun, moon, and stars, and the vegetable and animal forms of earth.

These are facts which can be very easily demonstrated to the satisfaction of every honest and intelligent man and woman. As nothing comes from nothing, so every thought, feeling, sensation, emotion, and aspiration of the heart and brain springs from something. And what that something is we can fully appreciate when we consider that man is a structure that it has taken ages upon ages to build up, and that in the building up of this human structure every animal that preceded his advent contributed the most positiv element of its own character to the erection of what we might call an animal pantheon—that is, a living and moving temple in which all vegetable and animal life is embodied and represented. This brings us to the conclusion that all animal life (collectivly and essentially) is immortal so long as man exists. When all vegetation has become extinct, and every animal form has passed away, and when the human race ceases to propagate its kind, and man finally makes his exit—the condition of the earth being then unfavorable for the existence of any kind of life such as now prevails, unless some higher form of being is evolved from man—the aspect of the human race will then be as unsatisfactory as is that of the long line of animals whose bones and substance hav long since become a part of the soil. If we liv as the dead animals of the world now liv in the human structure, we can only liv in the ever-changing elements of universal matter from which every form that has ever existed has emanated. If this be the truth, if nature in all its universal aspects can be embraced and comprehended in the term God, we human beings, as well as all things else, are a part of that God, and no one can deprive us of our share in the divinity. If reason has an office, and if, by its aid, any logical truth can be grasped by comparing the things that surround us with those in the unfathomable depths of the stellar universe, this seems to be the destiny of man and beast. Infinities.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In an article on Theism, by Otto Wettstein, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 27, 1886, is this passage: "Among the postulates of science which are established with axiomatic certainty are the eternity of time, the infinitude of space, and the eternity and infinitude of matter filling all space."

Now, while I do, and many of your readers may, agree with Mr. Wettstein in many things, I cannot see how we are to understand this language. If matter is infinit, what becomes of space? Is it possible that that can be infinit too? Can two infinities occupy the same place at the same time, or at any time? If they cannot, are they infinit? Can two infinities exist?

What are we to understand by this word space, anyway? There may be "space" in Illinois, but here in Michigan it is ever full of something; if not matter, you can know for a certainty that a wolverine has got there. F. B. HALL.

The Hell of the Christian Deity.

From the Secular Review.

But to return to hell. I fear not the coarse brimstone hell of Christian teleology. It is simply the savage fable of a barbarous time, and is rapidly dying away before the sunrise of a higher civilization. Albeit, O Lord, I do not know that it requires brimstone and burning flesh and darkness to make a hell. We are strangely and wonderfully made. Physiology cannot solve the mystery of the ego, anatomy cannot unravel the threads of being, and microscopy is blind and chemistry is dumb. There is something in us not of the earth—something that makes us susceptible to flashes from the jewels in the tiara of God and the wafted fragrance from the myrtle that grows on the hills of heaven. The lens and the syphon are crushed to dust before the magnificence of Ambition and the glory of Love.

Hast thou ever sat, O Lord, under the hawthorn breathing quiet and wafting fragrance, as day died away and as up rose the vesper star, and as peered from behind a horizon cloud one horn of the solemn moon? Of the daughters of men the sons of God saw that they were fair (see Genesis vi, 2); did the fairest of these daughters of men sit by thy side under that hawthorn white with May, while the day was melting into death and the night was being born? In an impassioned kiss did her gold-red hair mix with your locks of brown, and did her panting breath mingle with yours? Did you linger there when the day was no more, when Night reigned in her mystery and silence, and whitened the mist with the gleam of a million stars? And, with Orion and the Pleiades for witnesses, did that maiden and yourself mutually vow to love forever and forever; and did you hear the beating of your own heart and hers in the hush of that night of joy?

And then! She lav silent. The orange wreath was not on her flushed brow, but in her pale hands were the lilies of Death. Hast thou ever counted the bridal favors of Agony and sung the epithalamium of Despair? Hast thou ever stood in the dark in the field of tombs, letting the fingers fondly rest on the chiseled name of the darling dead? How terrible the plectrum-stroke that breaks every tense chord of the lyre of Being! How fearful the blow that dashes from the lips the cup of bliss and love, leaving only the goblet of Marah and misery! How terrible is the world that, for axis, revolves round a tombstone and a corpse, leaving its death-blasted denizen to write with his curdling blood the record of suffering! Hast thou known the misery of him for whom the world's only architecture is a lettered stone, and the world's only flora the violets he has planted on a grave? All subsequent love is a specter, and all subsequent joy a phantom. Love's raiment is the winding-sheet, and joy's spangles only the tinsel torn from the coffin lid of her you kissed in the hawthorn shade under the silent clouds and the solemn moon. Should any asperse thy power, call me as a witness that thou canst make hell, O God.

And even should the rose-bud of love's morning bloom in the flush of life's midday, and retain its sweets till the mellow twilight of life's afternoon, there must come for it the chilly night and the winter of death and desolation. The one heart must beat, while the other is clay. The one shall be taken, and the other left. The one remains at the old home in the village street; the other is in the village graveyard, under the ash and the cypress, among the matted wild flowers, where the grasshopper leaps and chirms, and the lizard basks in the sun. In the old churchyard of the village there is a mound where the green of the grass has not yet quite covered the red of the earth; and in the old village home there is an eerie silence and an ever-empty chair, and a desolate heart that will be no more what it once had been.

The day will dawn when one of shall hearken
In vain to hear a voice that has grown dumb,
And morns will fade, noons pale, and shadows darken,
While sad eyes watch for feet that never come.

One of us two must some time face existence
Alone, with memories that but sharpen pain,
And these sweet days shall shine back in the distance
Like dreams of summer dawns in nights of rain.

One of us two, with tortured heart half-broken,
Shall read long-treasured letters through salt tears;
Shall kiss with anguished lips each cherished token
That speaks of these love-crowned delicious years.

One of us two shall find all light, all beauty,
All joy on earth, a tale forever done;
Shall know henceforth that life means only duty—
O God! O God! hav pity on that one!

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

Not only on our feeble flesh—heir to a thousand ills—but on the subtlest and holiest susceptibilities of the soul and spirit, falls the doom of the damned. I who write hav trodden the red wine press of thy wrath, on my head hav been emptied all the contents of the seven phials, and I can bear witness that thou canst make hell, O God.

In almost every home there is a baby-chair, screwed to its pedestal to make it higher than the other chairs, that baby may sit at table, and with the guard in front that baby may not fall. Many a father and mother would not exchange that poor chair for a regal throne. Thou hast framed them so, O God, that it would kill them to part with it, although it tortures them to possess it. It is haunted by a spirit, and in it and around it there is ever a vision of small pink feet and dimpled arms and innocent blue eyes and soft brown hair. And there is a terrible awakening from the holy dream. The babe can no longer be clasped in the father's arms, and its lips can press that mother's breast no more. There only remains a lock of hair and a pair of small red shoes, with a power to fill with tears the eyes that look upon them and a spell that can wring two hearts in unspeakable pain, and instil memories of a cold, sad day in the winter, when the gravel from the spade sounded hollow upon a little coffin covered with flowers. In the memory of two tiny feet, whose tread shall never again be heard on my floor, in the memory of the prattle of my child that shall greet my ears no more forever, by the tears that dim my eyes as I write these words, I testify that thou canst make hell, O God! SALADIN.

The Church and Its Supporters in Mexico City.

From Joaquin Miller's Mexican Letter in the Independent.

Hat in hand, let us enter the lofty doors of the cathedral, if only for a moment. Gold and silver, and silver and gold! Get a book and read of this cathedral. After that you can better understand the splendor and the squalor that come clashing together inside these doors, in awful contrast.

Look forward at the far, deep nave! Fifty feet high and forty feet wide! You see nothing but gold and gold and gold! The image of God and his angels. Old, bald-headed Saint Peter patiently holding his keys and ready to unlock heaven to the kneeling world.

And now look on the dirty floor before you. A thousand poor creatures crawling about, some blind, some lame, some dying of loathsome diseases, and all very, very miserable; all naked, and hungry, and helpless; yet a sea of glittering gold before them.

The music is sublime! Mass is being said for some dead Mexican robber of princely fortune, and so the singers, the priests, the little boys, and the big boys, too, are all doing their best.

A good many of the cripples that crawl about over the dirty floor hav lottery tickets to sell. Many an old woman with a babv on her back offers you a lottery ticket, by way of breaking the ice, and getting well enough acquainted to ask you for a cent. Every day, every hour, in church and out of church, you are importuned by the poor to buy lottery tickets. A priest called on me the day I came to this curious town, imploring me to buy some lotterv tickets of him, for the benefit of his church and for his poor. These lotteries are conducted by the government, as in Italy. The government gets a large per cent. Those who sell the tickets ge a liberal commission. What I mean to say is, you can buy your tickets directly from the government a great deal cheaper than you can in the stores and on the streets.

Yes, indeed, it is simply awful. Every one expects to draw a grand prize to-morrow, and so why go to work to-dav? O Mexico, Mexico! why will you persist in standing forever in your own glorious light?

Deeper and deeper the organ sounds, and louder and louder the prayers for the dead. The people—the poor, naked, and lazv, and dirty people—all on their knees, join in the prayer for the departed soul. They fall on their faces, they spread their naked, dirty arms wide out on the the naked, dirty floor, and lie there praying and mourning in the dust on their faces, their splendor of hair sweeping up the dust.

Here comes in a priest to prav. He is leading a little boy. Perhaps this good priest is a sort of schoolmaster also. He has a book or two in his right hand, also a very large sheet of lottery tickets. He brushes the floor a little with his long greasy grown. He puts down the books, and then and there he places the lottery tickets, so that no one may steal them while he prays, and so he kneels on books and tickets, his head sidewise, his eyes closed; his fat and greasy hands are full of greasy beads. The little boy kneels on his robe behind. And the little boy, with beautiful eyes and cheeks like a rose, keeps looking roguishly about at some pretty little Mexicans with the mother praying at another altar. Let us go hence. I think God is outside.

Advice to an Inquirer.

Be careful, above all things, of professing to see in the phenomena of the material world the evidences of divine pleasure or displeasure. Doubt those who would deduce from the fall of the Tower of Siloam the anger of the Lord against those who were crushed. Doubts equally those who pretend to see in cholera, cattle plague, and bad harvests evidences of divine anger. Doubt those spiritual guides who, in Scotland, hav lately propounded the monstrous theory that the depreciation of railway scrip is a consequence of railway traveling on Sundays.—Professor Tyndall.

Enforcing Sunday Laws.

Section 259 of the Penal Code of this state recites that "the first day of the week being by general consent set apart for rest and religious use, the law prohibits the doing on that day of certain acts hereinafter specified, which are serious interruptions of the repose and religious liberty of the community." Sections 263–269 specify what shall not be done on Sunday, as follows:

SEC. 263. All labor on Sunday is prohibited, excepting the works of necessity or charity. In works of necessity or charity is included whatever is needful during the day for the good order, health, or comfort of the community.

SEC. 264. It is a sufficient defense to a prosecution for work or labor on the first day of the week, that the defendant uniformly keeps another day of the week as holy time, and does not labor on that day, and that the labor complained of was done in such manner as not to interrupt or disturb other persons in observing the first day of the week as holy time.

SEC. 265. All sporting, hunting, fishing, playing, horse-racing, gaming, or other public sports, exercises, or shows, upon the first day of the week, and all noise disturbing the peace of the day, are prohibited.

SEC. 266. All trades, manufactures, agricultural or mechanical employments upon the first day of the week are prohibited, except that when the same are works of necessity they may be performed on that day in their usual and orderly manner, so as not to interfere with the repose and religious liberty of the community.

SEC. 267. All manner of public selling or offering for sale of any property upon Sunday is prohibited, except articles of food may be sold and supplied at any time before ten o'clock in the morning, and except also that meals may be sold to be eaten on the premises where sold or served elsewhere by caterers; and prepared tobacco in places other than where spirituous or malt liquors or wines are kept or offered for sale, and fruit, confectionery, newspapers, drugs, medicins, and surgical appliances may be sold in a quiet and orderly manner at any time of the day.

SEC. 269. Sabbath breaking is a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine not less than one dollar and not more than ten dollars, or by imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding five days, or both (New York Penal Code, 1885).

For two or three years there hav been in this city organizations of hat and dry goods salesmen, who hav made strong endeavors to hav these laws enforced. The preachers of the gospel, in whose behalf the laws were passed, hav also endeavored to enforce them, but without any very brilliant success. The efforts of the hat and dry-goods salesmen, many of whom hav been forced to labor on Sunday, hav until now been as little rewarded. At one of the campaign meetings of Henry George, the president of the Hat Salesmen's Union pathetically related how he had been to every city official having power, from the mayor and judges down to the police captains, asking them to close the stores on Sunday. Aid and comfort had been refused him in every instance, and it looked as though the workers' unions were as powerless as the preachers.

But at last a change of heart has affected our city officials. Henry George polled over 68,000 votes this fall—a third of the entire vote of the city. The unions were the source whence he derived his support, and now the unions can hav pretty much anything they want from the laborious loafers in the City Hall. They will be expected to pay for it at the next election. So when the representativs of the unions called the attention of Mayor Grace to the Sunday laws, he promptly wrote to the superintendent of police to notify his captains to order the patrolmen to see that no hatter or dry-goods merchant kept his store doors open at all, and that no grocer, butcher, baker, or other person dealing in the necessaries of life, kept his store open after ten o'clock in the morning. The order was partially enforced.

We hav had these spasmodic exhibitions of septenary virtue before this, and shall probably hav them again, until the Sunday laws are removed from the statute books. A few years ago Howard Crosby's society prodded the officials up to a performance of their alleged duty, and the city was made decidedly uncomfortable for a Sunday or two. Bootblacks, even, were forbidden to ply their trade, the newsdealers were interfered with, and the luckless grocer who weighed out a pound of sugar after ten o'clock in the morning was arrested. For one Sunday the law was strictly enforced; by the next, the zeal of the police had become lukewarm; by the next, public opinion sat down very hard upon the self-constituted censors of private actions. Since then all stores except saloons hav kept open or not, as the proprietors found it profitable.

It is scarcely probable that the efforts of the unions will produce more lasting effects than those of the clergy. Sunday laws are opposed to the sentiment of all large communities, and in entering upon their crusade against the Bowery hatters and Baxter street old-clothes merchants, the clerks will find themselves in opposition to almost a whole city. Whether they are sufficiently strong to coerce a million or so of more or less sensible people is a question for time to determin. The ministers, with all their wealth and influence, could not do it. Perhaps 68,000 voters can until the next election. Then the unions will find out their mistake. People do not like to be "run" by hat and dry-goods clerks any better than by the clergy.

A Humbug Critic.

April 18, 1885, we printed statistics from the prison reports of sixty-six prisons of one kind and another, showing the denominational bias of the prisoners. The number of prisoners was 44,034. Of these, 41,335 either gave the denomination in which they were reared, or simply said they were Protestants. The balance, 2,699, were described in the reports as regular or irregular attendants at Sunday-school. Among this large number of prisoners, 2 were so-called Infidels, 1 an avowed unbeliever. Of the 41,335 Protestants, 6,650 did not giv their sectarian preference.

These figures hav been before the public now nearly two years, and our Christian contemporary around the corner has at last heard of them, and, calling it a "humbug census," walks bravely up the hill to attack their accuracy. The table given was:

Catholics	16,431
Church of England	9,975
Methodist	3,931
Presbyterian	3,703
Baptist	240
Jews	106
Lutheran	92
Christian	24
Universalist	5
Evangelical	4
Swedish Church	2
Episcopal	126
Dunkard	1
Quaker	1
Congregationalist	11
German Lutheran	7
German Evangelical	1
German Jews	2
United Brethren	3
Advent	2
Dutch Reformed	8
Mormon	3
Carmelite	3
Joss (China)	1
Infidel (2 so-called, 1 avowed)	3
Protestants whose Denomination is unknown	6,650
Making a total of	41,335
Unaccounted for	2,699
	44,034

These figures, says our pious friend, are obviously absurd, for the following reasons:

"There are represented as being 11 Congregational to 3,703 Presbyterian criminals.

"They represent that there are 3,703 Presbyterian criminals, and only 3,931 Methodist; this is also entirely absurd, as the Methodists of all classes in the United States are nearly or quite four times as numerous as the Presbyterians. Assuming them to be on the average precisely the same as to morality, they ought to hav at least four times as many criminals. But it is well-known that thousands of children in Methodist Sunday-schools throughout the country are from families that hav no other connection with any church than that their children come to the said schools; and that the Methodist church has been and still is doing a work among the uneducated and the poor which no other Protestant church attempts. It is natural that the number of persons charged with crime who would assign connection with Methodist congregations would be greater in proportion to the whole number than the number of those who would assign a Presbyterian connection.

"The Baptists are represented as having two hundred and forty criminals, when they are nearly two-thirds as numerous as the other Protestant sects in the United States, exclusiv of the Methodists, put together.

"The Jews, who furnish very few criminals relativly to their whole number, and hav a comparativly small number, are put down as having 106 criminals.

"Furthermore, as there are 6,650 Protestants whose denomination is unknown in the table, or nearly one in seven of the whole number, it is clear that the remaining statistics must be incorrect."

While we hav every disposition in the world to oblige the pious, we cannot change the figures even to add a few more to the sects so kindly looked after by the Christian editor. We took our figures from the official prison reports. We hav those reports on hand, and if the editor will giv good and sufficient security for their return, we will loan them to him for his own personal satisfaction.

But we fail to see the force of the criticism. Our point was, and is, that Christianity does not restrain from crime, and that the Christians of the country are also its criminals. We do not care to which sect they belong, and hav no objection to their being all Methodists, or all Baptists, or all Congregationalists. That only eleven of the prisoners owned up to being Congregationalists is accounted for by the fact that Congregationalism is not much heard of outside of New England, and these prisoners were in Western and Canadian penitentiaries. Why the Methodists do not show up in greater proportion to the Presbyterians we do not know, unless it may be that the Methodists added to their crimes the sin of lying, and, like Peter, denied their sectarian master. As to the Baptists, it would hav given us great pleasure to report more of them in jail, but, not being a Methodist, and quoting official figures, we could not misrepresent. The large proportion of Jews is easily accounted for. When a Christian is stood up before a prison clerk and asked his religion, he need not tell the precise species of Christian he is of, but can find shelter under the generic term Christian. A Jew, on the contrary, must answer, "Jew." The Hebraic law-breaker is always accurately recorded. He can not dodge, as can the Congregationalist or Methodist or Baptist.

Finally, if our religious contemporary is not satisfied with the sectarian division of the official prison reports, the editor can take the 2,699 described as regular or irregular attendants at Sunday-school and the 6,650 Protestants whose denomination is unknown, add them together, and divide them among the Protestant sects to suit himself. We shall not quarrel with any assignment of the rogues that he may make. He can credit all of them to either the Congregationalists or the Methodists or the Baptists, as his extensiv acquaintance with the rascality of the sects may seem to justify. The point we made in using the prison reports will not be dulled.

And, having walked bravely up the hill to attack our figures, we advise our pious friend to imitate his valorous prototype, and walk bravely down again.

A Fallacious Faith Cure.

About two months ago the London, Ontario, Advertiser printed a remarkable story of a faith cure. The story was that on June 8, 1885, Mrs. J. McKenzie, of that place, was taken sick. A medical diagnosis pronounced the cause a cold upon the lungs. Since then she was confined to her bed. Two months ago she remarked to her husband that she believed she could be cured by faith. The idea, she said, was put into her head by almighty God. A crowd of Christian brethren were summoned, and prayer and supplication ensued, at the termination of which, the account goes, she arose from her bed a well woman. The London Advertiser printed the story with big headlines and much circumstantiality of detail. We were at the time informed of the affair by a resident of London, who also informed us that the whole affair was a humbug. Last week we received a copy of the London Advertiser dated November 20th. In the local news was this significant item:

"Mrs. McKenzie, wife of Mr. James McKenzie, of Dundas street, died this morning after a lengthy illness. Deceased lady was thirty-four years old. During the recent visit of the exangelists, Avis and Brown, her case obtained some notoriety in consequence of a report that she had been cured of her ailment by faith."

Christianity will probably derive great satisfaction from this faith cure, but we do not see just how it is going to be done.

The Catholic Church and Our Postmasters.

THE TRUTH SEEKER now has a contemporary in this city of which we cannot say it is "esteemed." Our contemporary is a new journal, and its name is The American Catholic News. The prospectus sets forth that the paper is cheap in price, large in quantity, and able in quality. The list of contributors includes some good men, among them James Redpath of the North American Review, a thoroughgoing Infidel, whose contributions we shall read with curiosity. The prospectus has been sent to the postmasters of the country, with a special plea for them to become the agents of the paper.

The first issue of this paper is dated November 17th. The leading communication is by Henry A. Brann, a noted priest of this vicinity, and is headed "The Republic in Danger." This article, which represents the purpose of the new journal, discloses the significance of the journalistic venture by the church.

Beginning by calling Infidelity "red-handed," the Rev. Mr. Brann proceeds to state by implication the doctrins of the opposit party—the Roman Catholic church. His words are worth preserving:

"The American who murders faith in Christ will not scruple to kill his children after they are born.

"A new danger threatens. The doctrin of original sin is practically ignored. The law of labor is attacked. Instead of preaching the truth of Christian asceticism that we are all born in sin, that we must labor and suffer, and that the more we labor and suffer here, the greater will be our reward hereafter, new apostles arise to tell us that property is theft, that society is the devil, that Anarchy should be law; that laborers should rebel against their employers, and kill the goose that lays the golden egg. That a Utopia, conceived in the brain of men immoral and unprincipled, and hatched into life amid the fumes of absinthe and beer, should be substituted for the present state of society which has the sanction of centuries of orthodox Christianity to sustain it, is not only wicked, but absurd.

"Men dream of making this earth, which on account of sin is only a place of probation and suffering, a heaven of beer saloons and harems for the working classes.

"Now what is it that has been effecting this change in our people and in their ideas? Much is due to the importation of foreign notions by the scum of foreign nations. But a chief source and fountain of infection is found in our public schools as at present established.

"They are not only destitute of moral teaching, but moral training becomes impossible in them. There can be no solid moral training separate from doctrinal teaching. The law of belief is the law of morals. You may tell people to be good, but unless you can promis them rewards for well-doing, and punishments for evil-doing, not only here, but hereafter, unless you can giv sanction to your precept, human passions will break through your training. Even where men believe in God, in heaven, and in hell, and are not held in check by the strong influences of orthodox Christianity, they break the laws and indulge their evil appetites. If they do this in the green wood, what will they do in the dry? If the well-built dyke of Christianity is not strong enough to prevent the abuse of free will and keep back the flood of licentiousness, how will your makeshift of a baseless ethics restrain the evil inclinations of nature? Is the bayonet to be the only God to keep the rabble down; and the switch the only law to repress the rebellious child? But the public school has abolished even the switch for the child. The bayonot and the gun will be needed to keep him down when he grows older.

"A school full of Jews, Unitarians, Protestants of every hue, and Catholics; with teachers, some Jews, some Agnostics, some whose conduct is good, and some whose conduct is known to be disedifying; a school without God, without prayer, except sometimes one that is mocked or rejected by a large portion of the scholars; a school in which little girls of ten are taught anatomy, but not permitted to learn the Apostles' Creed; a school in which the teachers are chiefly appointed by political influence; in which they are frequently mercenaries teaching for hire without any regard to the moral training of the children; a school in which the theories of prominent Infidels are accepted by many of the teachers, who believe in Darwin, Tyndall, and Herbert Spencer, and accept the Popular Science Monthly for their evangel instead of the Ten Commandments and the orthodox faith of their fathers—such is the public school, promiscuous, indifferent, godless even when it is not actually immoral in its whole environment.

"And this is the cradle in which the young American mind is being brought up."

That is the complaint; this is the remedy:

"'But we cannot settle the school question,' say some. Then your American statesmen must be very deficient in sagacity and expedient. Germany and Austria and other countries hav settled it on the denominational basis. There ought to be statesmanship enough in this country to equal theirs.

"At any rate, the Catholic doctrin and demand stand. The rights of God are prior to those of the state or even of the parent. The child's soul is God's, is Christ's. Christ demands that the child's soul shall be trained in his doctrins and morals, and saved from contaminating influences and danger. This can only be done by daily cultivation at home and in the school, of the child's spiritual nature. It must be daily instructed in the fear and love of God.

"Only a physical or a moral impossibility will justify a Catholic for not doing his duty in the matter. Nor will he be satisfied with any homeopathic dose of religion in the schools. The singing of hymns and a mere perusal of a bit of the Bible will not do. The Catholic wants his child to be taught the positiv dogmas of his church, and the positiv precepts of her moral code; for he believes in God, in Christ, the son of God, and in the church, the representativ of the redeemed on earth. He believes that his child will be a better citizen for being a better Christian; and that the chief danger of the republic is from the godless education of the young."

The Rev. Mr. Brann represents the Roman Catholic church. What he would do with our schools, that would the church do. His statement of her doctrins is correct. The rights of God—that is, of the church—are prior to the rights of the parent! The church would tear a child from its parents' care and bring it up a Roman Catholic.

This is the doctrin the new journal is started to propagate, and the postmasters of the country are asked to be its agents. If one of them does this, his pernicious activity should meet with proper reward.

Christian Unity.

A topic that has occupied a great deal of attention lately from the churches is what they call Christian unity—a coming together of all the sects upon a common basis, such as the Apostles' Creed and a few fundamental dogmas. The object of such union would be to resist the spread of Infidelity, hav Christianity taught in the schools, and God recognized as a power by our federal government.

Two church bodies hav considered this question in national council, the Congregational and the Episcopal. Of the deliberations of the former, the Independent, their organ, said:

"We earnestly believe that union between the churches is, next to their mission work, their first duty. We believe that Christians are not so far apart in their hearts as they keep themselvs in their organizations, and that evangelical churches Presbyterially governed, or Congregationally governed, and perhaps Episcopally governed, could come together very much easier than is generally supposed."

The Episcopalian House of Bishops sent this message to the Congregationalists' council:

"This house avows its solemn purpose, under the guidance of the holy spirit, to promote, with the concurrence of the House of Deputies, some practical plan for bringing before all our fellow-Christians in this land the duty to our common Lord and savior of terminating the unhappy divisions which dishonor his blessed name and hinder the triumph upon earth of his glorious kingdom."

Various religious papers hav urged this course upon the churches, and various ministers hav expressed their belief that some plan could be hit upon by which all the sects could gather under one roof. But until this week's TRUTH SEEKER is issued, no one will hav seen how this union scheme would work. Our artist has shown them. Mr. Heston is a keen historian and a long-headed prophet, and on our first page he shows how by cheerfully laboring together the sects can suppress Infidelity. They hav but to follow the efficacious methods of their ancestors, and the thing is done. The Congregationalists of New England can unite with the Calvinists of Geneva; the Catholics of Continental Europe with the Episcopalians of England, and all gleefully contributing their best to their beloved work, they can heap the witches of Boston, the Unitarians of Geneva, the heretics of Europe, and the Catholics in Great Britain, into one united pile, and hav an auto-dâ-fé, witch-hanging, and Quaker-pressing all in one. It would be a regular Thanksgiving family reunion, and would, no doubt, result in the greatest harmony and good feeling between the sects.

The only obstacle that we can see is that this is a partially civilized age, owing to the persistent efforts of the obstinate heretics for whose benefit the union is contemplated, and there are laws which interfere with some religious ceremonies. Perhaps, though, by meeting in New Jersey, this legal difficulty could be removed.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

THERE are about a thousand of our subscribers in arrears, their indebtedness aggregating some two or three thousand dollars. To each one of these debtors, of course, the amount is small, but to us the amount is very large, and sadly hinders our work. We need this money—need it now—and we respectfully ask that it be remitted.

It costs a great deal of money to publish a large journal, and we hav no extensiv advertising patronage to help us out. We depend entirely upon the subscription list and book sales to obtain cash to pay bills, and when so large a sum as two and three thousand dollars is kept from us, the financial shoe grows painfully tight.

Every subscriber can see upon his tab just to what date his subscription is paid. Those whose time has expired are requested to remit at once.

Real Believers in the Bible.

Chicago has just been the place of conference of a small but very biblical lot of men. It was the premillennial conference of those who believe that the end of the world is not far distant.

The journals which report the proceedings say that the papers read at the conference were evidently the result of long and careful study of the Bible. Each idea advanced was supported by a scripture passage, which, it was claimed, authorizes it, and words and passages from the original Hebrew and Greek were often quoted, and their "true interpretation" given. The use of scriptural language all through the different papers was much more extensiv than one hears in the ordinary sermon of the day.

The people of Chicago called the meeting a congress of cranks. It is a curious fact that religious fanatics always talk Bible, and the closer they stick to that ancient volume in its literal meaning the greater lunatics are they considered. There is already a current saying, "the nearer the church, the farther from God," but it may well be superseded by another, "The nearer the Bible, the closer to the lunatic asylum," for nowadays the most biblical religion is regarded as the craziest.

Too Deep for Us.

A subscriber asks these questions, which he truthfully says are of prime importance to him and other wage-workers. He wants to know:

1. The editor's views on the tariff question.
2. What is the first thing necessary to do in order secure to the workers a just share of the wealth they create.
3. The editor's views on the coöperativ industrial system.

It would be easy enough for the editor to write down his opinions on the first and third queries, but it would not be so easy to prove he is right. An editor's opinion is worth no more than another man's except as he may be in a position to possess better information, and there are a great many people who know more about tariff and coöperation than we do.

As to the second question, we do not think that the man livs who can accurately answer it. A better and more just social system must be a growth. It is contrary to the past experience of the race to suppose that any empirical scheme can be devised that will fill the bill.

We turn all these questions over to the philosophers of the Manhattan Liberal Club. What they cannot settle, on five minutes' consideration, must be referred to omniscience when found.

A DISPATCH to the World, of this city, from Ishpeming, Mich., dated December 2d, runs as follows:

"All churches, schools, places of amusement, and public gatherings were closed by the Board of Health two weeks ago on account of diphtheria. The pastors of several churches, growing tired of waiting for an order for reopening, called a mass-meeting for to-night, at which it was resolved to open the churches again. Inasmuch as there were three deaths from diphtheria to-day, the action is thought by many citizens to be very hasty. It is likely to bring the churches into conflict with the municipal authorities, for the ministers say that they will open the churches, and the officers declare that they will not be permitted to do so."

The line of conduct of these preachers must be dictated by one of three reasons: They consider themselvs superior to the state, or they want to hear themselvs talk, or they regard the souls of their parishoners as of more consequence than their bodies. As all three of these reasons are wrong, the ministers are acting foolishly. But then, that is a common ailing of the men of God!

Letters from Friends.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., Nov. 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I should like to attend the convention of truth seekers. What a glorious band! Not one hypocri among them. What a happy thought! I wish to express my unbounded admiration for your valuable paper, which I hav been reading about one year, and for the teachings I hav received from it and the cartoons. I send you one dollar for the Congress fund. CHAS. SACH.

LYNDON, ILL., Nov. 28. 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Having been so kind as to publish my former letter, I would offer this as a postscript.

Compare Geer's quotation from Ingersoll's Galesburg speech and the following, taken from "Wit, Wisdom, and Eloquence:" "I want an honest dollar. I want a coin dollar. I want a paper dollar, based on a coin dollar. I want the silver dollar worth as much as the gold dollar, it you hav to make it four feet in diameter."

But he don't tell the poor dupes that every time you open a new gold mine or a new silver mine you would hav to change the diameter of that "honest" dollar. And, Mr. Editor, for what few silver dollars I hav had to exchange I hav always been fortunate enough to receive just as much sugar coffee, tea, pork, beef, or corn as I could get for the gold dollar, although the silver dollar is worth twenty cents less than the gold dollar (intrinsic value—ah!). And out here in Illinois they will even receive the greenback for taxes, notwithstanding the fearful and unjust stab the accoucheurs gave this wonderful life-diffusing baby when it was born.

No honest man of intelligence ought to giv or receive the statement as truth that our paper money is based on coin.

C. H. BARTHEL.

EVANSTON, WY. T., Nov. 21, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $1.75, for which please send "Men, Women, and Gods," and the "Truth Seeker Collection."

This is my first year as a subscriber to your paper, and I am very much pleased with it. I was brought up in the Methodist Episcopal church, but failing to find truth and reason there, I hav investigated many other religions, and they all amount to the same thing—superstition. I see some of your correspondents write they hav been brought up Liberals. How I envy them! They hav no idea how hard it is to get out of the ruts of superstition into the light of liberty. The Liberals of the East ought to be well posted and able to do much work for the cause of freedom of thought. They hav opportunity of listening to such men as Ingersoll, Watts, Reynolds, Putnam, and others.

Speaking of Mr. Putnam puts me in mind of an article of his I read. on "Mormonism." Let me say he understands that ism better than any other writer I hav read.

A great many Liberals may think that it is queer church-members do not investigate and see what kind of a foundation their faith is built upon. They are afraid to do this. They are afraid of offending the God they worship. I know how I felt, and it took years for me to overcome this fear, but I am glad that I enjoy mental liberty now. I say "enjoy," for I do enjoy being free. When Sunday comes I can enjoy myself reading or taking a walk with my wife and children.

I am happy to say my wife also enjoys the light of mental liberty, therefore I do not hav to contend against my family, as, I see by letters in your paper, some of my brothers hav to do. I am anxious that my children should be taught universal mental liberty, but how I am to accomplish this is more than I can understand at present. Since having my eyes opened, I see that I am far behind, intellectually, what I should hav been if my education had been different in my youth.

I think the illustrations in THE TRUTH SEEKER are just what is needed. I can induce church-members to look at the ascension of Enoch or Carpenter Noah, when it would be impossible to get them to read an article.

W. R. MACDONALD.

CALISTOGA, CAL., Nov. 20, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Politics has had a lively turn in this state—no less than six nominees for governor, and badly-mixed tickets the rest of the way down the state list. The Democrats won the governor, and it is said that much money was won betting on his chances. A leading paper of San Francisco, having the facts in the office of Bartlett's election, kept booming Swift's count, while putting out coin through "pigeons" on Bartlett, and, it is said, won some $70,000. I think there is a law against betting at elections. Whether so or not, there is much of it done, and the principles supposed to be represented by the ballot are regarded with about as much esteem as those at a raffle.

L. Alexander, of Waterville, Minn., hits off the Dunkards very well. However, he is off a little in some things. The Dunkards do not derive their name from a saint, but, I think, from the words "thank you" in Dutch, which when pronounced sound much like dunka or donkah. The soup-eating is not exactly the communion, it is the part they call the "love feast," and they hav unleavened bread and a little wine to commemorate the death of Christ, or for sacramental purposes. They are of German origin, mostly, I think, and settled early in Pennsylvania and Maryland. From there they hav settled in many other states, but not as pioneers often, as they are a non-resisting sect. Many of them are very ignorant, and cite as an excuse that Christ chose his disciples and obtained most of his immediate following from among the poor and ignorant. They are usually of a benevolent turn, and practice their peculiar faith as a duty, and not as a business. Their preachers seldom expect or take pay for services of any kind—only when the minister is poor, and is called away from home, and is thus put to unusual expense.

They used to cut their clothes after a peculiar fashion, and wear coarse though substantial material. They are usually honest and industrious, and seldom make much noise or disturbance in the community. It is a rule among them—though the men do not all part their hair in the middle, as some are bald-headed and some are too slothful to part it at all, except perhaps on occasion. As a party once said, he washed once a month, whether he needed it or not—and of of later years still another portion of the men hav acquired considerable education, and fail to follow the customs of the older brethren. J. C. WEYBRIGHT.

MYRTLE CREEK, OR., Nov. 30, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: It is obvious that many people cannot giv up their Christ because they are not willing to giv up their sins; but continue sinning against nature and their race. The cause of learning, science, or humanity seems to be nothing to them. Their chief object is to gratify their sensual desires until death, and then to be wafted to an ideal heaven in the embrace of their savior. They join with the clergy in denouncing Infidelity, and in saying that a moral man is dangerous in any society. All respectable people should beware, for soon they will fall victims to their own folly. No Christ can save them from the inevitable fate that awaits them—a disgraceful life and a shameful death. Will the church ever advance enough to accept the idea of individual liberty and individual responsibility?

It is novel how some theologians accept science in part and yet protest it in part. They ask us to become fools that we may become wise, which simply means that we should sacrifice or ignore truth and knowledge in order to accept their mythical theology. Doctors of divinity hav always opposed the dissemination of scientific knowledge, which is good evidence that their divinity must be frail. Our divinity needs no assuming quack doctors to administer in any way. We are subservient to his inexorable laws, so the more we know of those laws the more we know of our divinity. We acknowledge the right of every man, woman, and child to speak of things divine, and to develop morally, socially, and intellectually. We believe that a man has as much sense before the priest lays his hands upon him as after—perhaps more.

It is peculiar to some people to denounce everything as untrue that does not harmonize with their views or belief. But though truth is not always beautiful or pleasant, it is nevertheless steadfast. Should all mankind accept an error, and reject the truth, the character of either is unchanged. Some manifest a desire to destroy and suppress all literature, except their own or that which is approved by their leaders. Yet, strange to say, they know little of their own reading, and much less of that they never read. Their plea is that anything of an immoral character, or anything that is obscene or licentious, should not be tolerated. Another plea they make is that a book or paper is bad in proportion to the falsehoods it contains. Now, to all this we agree, but through charity to them for their ignorance and delusion, we tolerate with them what they are not willing to tolerate with us. They may keep their fables and obscene tales until posterity and society outgrow them. We do not wish to perpetuate falsehood and superstition, although it is convenient to make comparisons, which make the truth sparkle like the polished diamond.

The voice of Bruno, of Italy, who was burnt in Rome on the 16th day of February, 1600, is sounding throughout the intellectual world. Copernicus, Galileo, Kepler, Newton, and a host of others add to the grand constellation as a memorial in history, besides living testimonials of their intellectual development and scientific progress.

We will simply say to fanatics when they find a lie or anything of a licentious character in our literature, prosecute to the extent of the law. But we will let theirs die a natural death—though we will criticise all the same and be charitable enough to console the mourners. L. C. HILL.

CONCORD, KY., Nov. 28, 1886.

TO MY CANADIAN CORRESPONDENT, Dear Sir: Your favor received, also Mr. Pentecost's sermon, "Gathered From the Ash," as he so airily puts it. The wounded snake of superstition "drags its slow length along," but the wound is mortal, and its last expiring gasp is only a question of time. Had I never inquired, I might hav been as devout a Christian as you appear to be, and might hav been repeating the same old story that you repeat. But when I asked where those hereafters were with which you and your kind seem to be so familiar, the only rational answer that I received was an echo. I would be sorry indeed to impugn your veracity, but I thought while reading your letter, you presented some of the best specimens of mendacity that I ever saw. There are but two ways of settling those sayings which you impute to Infidels, and they are very much alike. Either those persons that said these things were not Infidels, or, if they were Infidels, they never said them. This is conclusiv. The trouble with you good people is, you hav so much faith for seeing the impossible that you are unable to discern the actual. You are like the "winged brother of the cat"—you can see only in the dark.

Your friend, the Rev. Pentecost, failed to fulfil his promis. He declared unreservedly that he would prove the inspiration of the scriptures. He, like everyone else who has made that declaration, fell a victim to his own vanity. Bare aspersions of character never proved inspiration yet.

I will not detail his "evidence," because it is so old, and appears so incongruous in this era of comparativ enlightenment. Nor do I do see how this eminently good man can be so notoriously regardless of truth as to associate the vicious class to which he alludes with Infidels. That class are but the outgrowth of the atonement doctrin, and expect to avail themselvs of it in the eleventh hour. This reminds me of an anecdote of our friend, Colonel Evlar. An acquaintance approaching him with some show of eagerness, asserted rather enthusiastically that he was an Infidel. "And why, Billy," asked the colonel, "are you an Infidel?" The man, apparently unable to produce any reason, only replied, "Because I am." "Well," said the colonel, "if you can't giv your reasons, we don't want you." And that is just it—an Infidel is an Infidel upon principle, or he is not one at all.

His faith, to liv with high endeavor,
And deeds, when done, are done forever.

You mention the hypocrits of which the church is partly composed. 'Tis well. That institution is certainly a favorit harbor with them. Religion is just the article for masking deception. Should you exclude all except those who liv according to the "precepts," a single one of the dedicated edifices would hold them all, and not be densely packed, either.

You, like the rest, persis. in dwelling upon the "remorse of the dying hour." How long must that poor puny argument, if argument it may be called, be continued in the service? Has it not seen enough? Why should Infidels suffer remorse? It is not their history that is black with crime. It is not their pathway that is crimson with the blood of heretics. They hav no stakes and fagots and instruments of torture as souvenirs. These glories, this renown, were reserved for you. If Paine, Voltaire, and all those distinguished Infidels which you name are in hell, then hell is the most brilliant place on record; it is the most inviting. His satanic majesty displays very superior taste in his selections. If the august personage which you say you are serving possessed as much sagacity, or could see the value of policy as some do here, he would propose a compromise with this formidable enemy. Certain, your correspondent would prefer being in his good graces, seeing he is so potent for both good and ill.

I do not doubt for a moment that heaven is a very attractiv place for you. Gold crowns all sparkling with jewels, and robes of material, I suppose, to match gold houses, gold pavements (heavens, what a penchant these Christians hav for gold!), gold everything.

But I acknowledge nature as my mother, and I am going with her. She has proven herself capable of conserving her own interests, and I believe she will conserve mine. I am content, and

"If an exile on earth, be an outcast on high,
Liv on in thy faith, but in mine I will die."

I will be pleased to hear from you again.

VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

FORT WORTH, TEX., Nov. 28, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been looking for some time past for an article, or at least some notice, in THE TRUTH SEEKER on the projected Coöperativ Colony of Puget Sound, Wash. Ter., but if your paper has contained such notice it has escaped my scrutiny.

As a true reform journal, I think the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER are the proper place for the advocacy of any project that is intended to ameliorate the condition of the working people in general, and believing that this colony will be a means to enlighten the public as to how a better state of things than exists at present can be brought about, I should like to see this project thoroughly discussed in your journal.

Their first pamphlet says: "This colony is projected on a plan where the manufacturer, the artist, the engineer, the architect, the contractor, merchant, laborer, fisherman, farmer, dairyman, florist, and others may unite their industry and means in coöperativ corporation, by which, under a thorough system of mutual exchanges and products, they may hav all the profits of their own labor, and the economical advantages of their own coöperation."

I do not see why this cannot be accomplished, and particularly so in a new country like Washington Territory, where the colony has already secured an admirable site, with excellent harbor, safe and convenient for the largest vessels of the ocean.

The followers of Henry George will, in this community, see their principle regarding land put into practice, as will be seen by the following paragraph of the colony's pamphlet: "The land will be purchased by the corporation, and the use only to the same for actual occupation for homes will be sold to colonists, in city lots, varying from 25x150 feet to a whole square occupying 300x600 feet—there being 48 lots in each block, a block being the greatest amount of city property which any one colonist will be allowed to purchase. Although the right to the use for homes is all that will be sold, yet for home purposes the ownership is complete, as the colony does not limit the time of holding, but simply prohibits the same from being leased, rented, mortgaged, or sold to any other than the joint stock company, and then only for the price paid and for the value of the improvements, upon which condition the company will always hold itself ready to take back the same and pay the purchase price and for the improvements. Lots not to be selected until the colonist is ready to improve and occupy the same, and the right thereto becoming forfeited by non-use, the forfeiture giving the right of purchase by the corporation."

As there will be no room for churches and ministers in this new community, except if the latter follow some more useful avocation, the project should be of interest to Freethinkers, even if they do not intend to join the colony. The principles by which it will be guided contain the following in regard to religion: "That the sentiment of religion is good in the proportion that it inspires the feeling of duty to every creature that comes within the sphere of one's life—a duty in thought and a duty in action—and that religion is sacred to, and belongs strictly to, the individual, and not to the colony, to a municipality, to a society, or to an association." And again their pamphlet says: "The church has no claim upon us. We will try and prevent our colonists from looking so high and so distant for their happiness as to look over and beyond the every-day affairs needing their attention. Our care is with this earth. We hav had enough of 'hell' practically, and too little of 'heaven.' We hav had church until we can't rest. Let us hav more of the best moral teachings of Christ put into practice."

I would like to mention some more of the many good features of the project, but fearing that these lines will already take too much space, I will close, with the hope that through this letter some readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will become interested enough in the colony to make further inquiries about it, which the secretary of the Central Puget Sound Colony Society, at Seattle, will be glad to answer. Address, Mrs. Laura E. Hall, P. O. Box 131, Seattle, Wash. Ter.

Yours truly, CHAS. PETERS.

STEUBENVILLE, O., Nov. 30, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose a clipping from a newspaper that speaks volumes on the evils of emotional religion:

MRS. M. B. Woodworth, the evangelist, who is now conducting a series of revival meetings at Muncie, Ind., has received a petition signed by a large number of church-members, asking her to discontinue her preaching in that city. The petition states as a reason for making the request, that, "as the result of your recent meetings, we hav seen one of our most respected citizens made defendant in a $10,000 libel suit; we hav seen one of our fair daughters carried from our midst by one of your camp-followers, and another brought to the verge of a suicide's grave; we hav seen a mother whose children needed her constant and tender care, rendered insane. So long is the list of similar results, we feel it our duty to request you, as we do, that you cease your labors in our midst and go hence."

This evangelist is one of many all "working the same racket" to play on the emotions of the weak-minded, and make money. If they could be put under the water treatment at the nozzle of a six-inch hose for a short time it would be little enough punishment for the evil they do; but that would not suit the majority, who like to see superstition triumphant. It is only when you speak against tyranny and monopoly that the law punishes for speaking. Free speech in this country is only for the majority. If you even attend a meeting where the evils of our present mock civilization are likely to be spoken of you are liable to be hanged, especially if the police attack a lawful meeting, and somebody gets hurt.

Then if you are within hearing you may be hung for an accessory. You are equally guilty with the man that throws the bomb, and the police can attend any meeting if it is suspected of holding opinions opposit to the opinions of the majority. How the autocrat of Russia would laugh in his sleeve when he heard of the hanging of seven or eight men because they had opinions and dared to state them against the opinions of the majority of this free republic! What a mockery of freedom of speech, and what a commentary on our glorious Constitution, which says that Congress shall pass no laws to abridge the freedom of speech or of the press!

J. DOWNES.

GOD'S TOWN, OUT WEST, Nov. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am not a moral coward, but I am a religious hypocrit; and it is eminently fitting that I should be so. Accordiug to my circumstances, it is perfectly proper. I am a teacher, the principal of quite an important school, and were it known that I entertained a siugle heterodox thought, I would be asked to resign quicker than if I were the fallen archangel himself. Indeed, my first experience of my board of education was almost a "grand bounce," because I played a game of chess on Sunday!

The sole work in which I take pleasure is teaching. I hav rushed like mad from one profession to another, in order to find one which did not require a creed. But it was like gall and wormwood to me to be in any work but that of school teaching. As a teacher I am a success, and as a religious hypocrit I am a success. Of all things that I detest, a religious hypocrit is the most detestable, but the infernal inquisition of the Christian boycott makes the teacher's manhood a sniveling imbecility. Openly I smile benevolently on the sentiment that takes my manhood from me, but loathe in my heart the tyrannic souls of these ultra-Puritanic guardians of education.

Liberty and education are the grand saviors of mankind, the glorious redeemers of the world. But how many crimes are committed in their dear names! In my school I try hard to inculcate the deepest and grandest truths of morality, and teach that which will make noble men and noble women, but on Sunday I am compelled by public sentiment to listen to the cant of intellectual sterility, and smile serenely on the stories of Job and the red dragon. It is enough to send any man to Bedlam. The divine Ingersoll tells us to cast all our cares on him, as it does not hurt him to carry them. I would gladly do so, but with my pack St. Peter's gate would hav to be widened.

I send you a clipping from the New York School Journal, to show you under what a sentiment the Liberal-minded schoolmaster must labor. I cannot believe in the divinity of the scriptures. It is impossible. But to be a success in school, to retain my position, to be treated as an honorable member of the profession, I must appear to do so. I must appear to swallow it all. Perhaps there are places in this "land of the free" where I would not be thrown out of my profession for my honest belief, but I hav never found that heavenly Canaan.

The School Journal says, editorially, "It is a matter of legal enactment that the teacher must be a moral man. Morality includes religion; hence, the teacher must be a religious man." So say they all. It further says, in the same article: "A spiritual power he must be, or he is no teacher—no former of character. And, finally, the man with a spiritual side to his mind will know more of any branch of knowledge, and teach it better, than one who has neglected thus to perfect his nature. The noblest characters in the world, the men who are doing the most in the world, are men who employ the force that comes from enlarged spiritual natures."

This is libelous, this is blasphemy, or history is a farce and reason a jack-o'-lantern. I never knew before that Kellogg, of the School Journal, is a Salvation Army man, or a follower of the meek and lowly Talmage.

If I did not hav faith in the ultimate triumph of reason, of being released finally from the shackles of fanaticism; if I did not believe that I will see the time when, untrammeled, I can teach morality without a savior and manhood without the regeneration of a blood atonement, I would say, "Truly, wisdom increaseth sorrow, and an intellectual life is not worth living."

Yours in envy for your freedom, and in disgust for my chains, SCHOOLMASTER.

OSHKOSH, WIS., Nov. 28, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: If my memory serves me right, there is a balance of thirty cents due me at your office, for which please send me your ANNUAL for 1887 as soon as it is out, and the balance in tracts.

Knowing you to be a very liberal man, I inclose you an envelope from the first Methodist Episcopal church of this city in which Messrs. Potter and Miller are holding revival meetings. Now, you can inclose your donation in this little envelope, and I will pledge you the honor of a square-toed Infidel that it will be delivered just as you may direct. This is not the only way they collect money to keep up these revivals, for a few evenings ago the preacher said, "I want to find ten persons in this audience who will giv $20 each," and he found them. Then he said he wanted to find ten more persons who would giv $10 each, and after finding them he called for ten more persons who would giv $5 each. Then he made another call for twenty persons who would giv $2 each, and then for twenty more who would giv $1 each. I am told that Messrs. Potter and Miller get $50 a week each for running this gospel shop, and I believe they intend to run it as long as it will pay. They claim to hav converted one hundred men in the last three weeks, but I happened to see how some of it was done. I saw Mr. Potter fairly drag a young girl out of a pew to get her to come up to the altar to be prayed for, and this they call converting them! Had it been a daughter or other relativ of mine, I would hav worn out my cane on him. I called in there one evening last week with a friend of mine, and when Mr. Potter came around looking for dupes, he put his hand on my shoulder and said to me, "You are a Christian, ain't you?" "No, sir, I am a square-toed Infidel," said I. "Well, I am glad to see you here," said he, and when he returned down the aisle he stopped again and shook hands with me, saying. "You must come often." I said, "I am no hypocrit, sir; I liv right up to my profession, and I know many Christians who do not."

My TRUTH SEEKER comes regularly, and I must say that those cartoons are immense. They are making more Liberals than all of our lecturers put together. Long liv Heston! It has been more than a year since we had a Liberal lecture here. What do you mean to do with this city, anyhow? Do you intend to let us all go to the devil, and not put forth a a saving hand? Think of it. Here is a city of twenty-five thousand inhabitants, and only one Liberal lecture in a year. No wonder the God-shops prosper. If I were able I would hav a lecturer here once a week at least, but I am not. If these people could hear the other side of the question once a month, ten of these preachers would hav to ride on one horse. Please send us a speaker if you can, and they will always be welcome at my house, and I will take as good care of them as any hotel in this city.

GEO. M. HARE.

WATERTOWN, N. Y., Dec. 1, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Last Saturday night Mr. John E. Remsburg, of Kansas, commenced a series of Liberal lectures at the Music Hall, this city. Owing to the fact that the lectures were not properly advertised the audience was not very large. Mr. Remsburg's lecture was "Thomas Paine, the Apostle of Liberty;" and in eloquent language he paid a glowing tribute to the "author-hero" of the Revolution. The lecturer mentioned the principal events connected with the life of Paine, and the high esteem in which he was held in America and France. Thomas Paine was a champion of liberty, a pioneer of human thought, a friend of morality and truth, of the poor and oppressed, and waged war with relentless vigor against ignorance and superstition. After the death of Paine the Christians, with fiendish malignity, attempted to destroy the reputation of this illustrious man. The splendid services he rendered his country were forgotten. All the falsehoods that hypocrisy could write and tell, all the slimy slander that Christian malice could invent, were exultingly hurled at the defenseless dead. These slanders Mr. Remsburg met with unanswerable logic, and proved that Thomas Paine died as serenely as any inquisitor of the middle ages! also that in his last hours he was kindly cared for by loving friends, and did not die in wretchedness and want.

Sunday afternoon, at 2:30, a fair-sized audience greeted the orator from the West. His subject was "Sabbath-Breaking," and was full of eloquence and wit. Sunday evening a still larger audience listened to the eloquent words that fell from the lips of this brave defender of Thomas Paine. The evening subject was "False Claims." In this lecture the audience saw a picture of Christianity in its palmiest days. They saw that for thousands of years the world has been at the mercy of dishonest and designing priests, who hav remorselessly trampled beneath their brutal feet all the sacred liberties of man; they heard the sobs and groans of murdered millions, and saw the lurid flames of the auto-da-fe as they leaped around the limbs of shrieking martyrs; they saw the bloody sword of war in the cruel clutch of the church; saw it cut through the fairest portion of the globe a wide swath of desolation and despair. Over these frightful fields of death, among the smoldering ruins of a thousand years, they saw the bleaching bones of martyred multitudes as left by the ravenous wolves of superstition. To-day the church, with a leering look of a fiend upon her brazen face, coolly informs the world that Christianity is the great promulgator of science, and attempts to clasp to her withered breast of faith the brave thinkers of the past.

Mr. Remsburg is a speaker of great earnestness and force, and with him the Liberals of Watertown were favorably impressed. While in this city he was kindly entertained by Hon W. S. Smith and his accomplished wife.

BURLINGTON, KAN., Nov. 22, 1886.

BROTHERS SOMERBY AND MACDONALD: It has been a long and eventful period in our national history of eight months since I hav offered a communication to be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. The premonitory symptoms of an approaching collision of arms between labor and the proud and aristocratic moneyed lords and monopolistic power of our country are unmistakable. I would be less discouraged if it were not for the accursed evil practiced to a greater or less degree by all the different grades of voters and public officials whom we elect to guard our liberties selling themselvs and their public trust for a mess of pottage. It would be well for them to heed the injunction of the Apostle James, who, in his warning to the rich and arrogant oppressors of his day, uses the following language: "Go to, now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are motheaten. Your gold and silver is cankered, and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye hav heaped treasure together for the last days. Behold the hire of the laborers who hav reaped down your fields which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth, and the cries of them which hav reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabbaoth. Ye hav lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton; ye hav nourished your hearts as in a day of slaughter. Ye hav condemned and killed the just, and he doth not resist you."

I ask any candid, unprejudiced person, either skeptic or believer, if the present time is not similar, in whole or part, to the time when the writer penned the above quotatiou. And are we not adopting the old pro-slavery claims and practices that existed in the South during the antislavery agitation? How far hav we evoluted when a mob of police enter a newspaper office of Chicago and forbid the publishing of anything that would reflect sympathy for the condemned so-called Anarchists, on pain of having their press destroyed? These men were tried as Anarchists, and a verdict born from the brains of a jury governed by ignorance, fear, revenge, and avarice. Avarice, because old Shylock's hireling threw the bomb, and controled the court, and if those men are executed, according to the sentence, it will be the most horrible crime that ever was perpetrated against the freedom of speech and the press. And I ask again, are not our liberties in danger when the same mob of police visit a meeting of laborers and warn them that if they pass any resolutions sympathizing with the unjustly condemned men their meeting would be suppressed?

We doubtless, many of us, remember the fate of Parish Lovejoy and his press at Alton, Ill.; how he was murdered and his press destroyed by a pro-slavery mob. Numerous instances might be quoted proving that things are occurring at the present time all over the country under the reign of King Gold similar to those that occurred under the reign of King Cotton in the South. Then we are satisfied that the old saying is true that history repeats itself, both in Biblical times and our present age. I consider that our public press has committed an egregious error in not informing the public mind on the true doctrins of Socialism according to Webster: "A system of society which advocates a more precise, orderly, and harmonious arrangement of the social relations of mankind than that which has hitherto prevailed." "Socialist, one who advocates the doctrins of Socialism."

A few remarks to our Liberal friends in regard to the above agitated questions. It is interesting to read the differences of opinions. One thinks the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is wrong in advocating justice to those seven innocent men. I think he was right, but he did not express himself as fully as I would were I in the same position. Another is afraid that priestcraft will strengthen its cause. Others who hav not evolved out of their orthodox shell from ignorance, fear, and revenge, demand the Anarchists' execution.

Those men may hav been radical in their views, and visionary in teaching their theories, but that is no excuse for debarring them from the privilege of coming to this country, and the right of the freedom of speech and the press. If our government cannot stand the strain of the promulgation of the doctrins of a few Anarchists and Socialists, it is time we knew it. With these considerations, I repeat, I cannot conceive of any reasonable excuse for the execution of those men as felons and murderers. But as our government is administered in the interest of the monopolists and Shylocks, and whatever they demand is granted; and as the doctrins of those men at Haymarket, on the 4th of May, were calculated to educate the laboring classes, and develop them in their manhood, it was objectionable to the aristocracy; and their object being the subjection of labor to their behests, they will use every means, fair or foul, to degrade it. The correct principles of a strong government are not in the suppression and limiting of freedom, but the education of the masses, and the unlimited exercise of our minds as long we do not trespass on the rights of others. Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Little Brown Hands.

(Selected by E. W. Chamberlain.)

"Little brown hands des like mine,"
Said a prattling child one day at play,
While lips of cherries bathed in wine
Kissed her face that summer day.
Little brown hands so soft and warm,
You come to me from foreign lands;
You weave a web and you wield a charm
That catch my heart, you little brown hands.

Little brown hands that gently press
My aching head and soothe the pain,
With your magic touch and soft caress,
Till I pray that my head may ache again.
Little brown hands that twist and twirl
The glass of life till its golden sands.
Flow fast or slow at your own sweet will;
O wondrous power of little brown hands.

Little brown hands, you come and go
With a cunning deftness all your own;
You are warm as wine or as cold as snow;
You weave a crown or you build a throne.
Little brown hands from across the sea,
From the sunny south, from the sunlit lands,
The sweetest task of my life shall be
To hold for aye those little brown hands.

School-Houses.

Years ago, when this country was first settled, there were few school-houses, and they were of the poorest and roughest kind. Generally they were made of logs, the cracks being filled with mud or clay. Sometimes there were spaces left in the wall for windows; these spaces were often covered with greased paper instead of glass. The seats were arranged around the room in a semicircle, or on three sides, the other side being filled with the fire-place, teacher's desk, or rough table that served for a desk, and the door. For an example, let us look at the school-house where Garfield went when a child. It was about twenty feet square, with floor made of logs split, and the smooth surface laid uppermost; the roof was made of slabs, the seats were rough log benches without any backs, and the school-house would accommodate about twenty-five scholars in all. School-houses are now to be seen in every village and town. Some are better than others, because some towns hav more money than others to use for educational purposes.

There is no one so poor but he can obtain an education now, while a hundred years ago people had to hav considerable money or a great deal of perseverance to obtain one.

Now let us look at the school-houses of to-day. Many of them are elegant with everything to please the eye and rest the mind. Is it any wonder that scholars learn easily? Rather is it not a wonder that they do not try harder and learn more than they do? Most of the country school-houses to-day are plastered and clapboarded. They hav good floors, and in every way are warm and comfortable. All the large school-houses are heated by furnaces instead of by a huge log fireplace, as they used to be. The advantages of to-day can never be realized more forcibly than by comparing them with those enjoyed by the people of a century, or even fifty years, ago.

Too Smart.

We do not like boys who think themselvs "smart," and want other people to think so too. A "smart" boy of this kind was once employed in the office of the treasurer of a Western railway. He was usually left alone in the office between the hours of eight and nine in the morning. and it was his duty to answer the questions of all callers as politely as possible.

One morning a plainly dressed old gentleman walked quietly in, and asked him for the cashier.

"He's out," said the boy, without looking up from the paper he was reading.

"Do you know where he is?"

"No."

"When will he be in?"

"'Bout nine o'clock."

"It's nearly that now, isn't it?"

"There's the clock," said the boy smartly, pointing to the clock on the wall.

"Oh, yes; thank you," said the old gentleman. "Ten minutes before nine. May I wait here for him?"

"I s'pose so, though this isn't a public hotel."

The boy thought this was smart and he chuckled loudly over it. He did not offer the old gentleman a chair, or lay down the paper he held.

"I would like to write a note while I wait," said the caller; "will you please get me a piece of paper and an envelope?"

The boy did so, and as he handed them to the old gentleman, he coolly said:

"Anything else?"

"Yes," was the reply. "I would like to know the name of such a smart boy as you are?"

The boy felt flattered by the word "smart," and replied with a gratified smile, "I answer to the name of Billy Thompson. But here comes the boss!"

The "boss" came in, and, seeing the stranger, cried out:

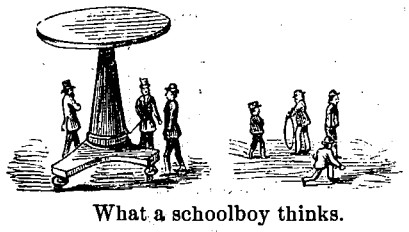
"Why, Mr. Smith, how do you do? We"——

But Billy Thompson heard no more. He was looking around for his hat. Mr. Smith was president of the road, and Billy heard from him later to his sorrow. Any one needing a boy of Master Billy's peculiar "smartness" might secure him, as he is still out of employment.—Selected.

The Game Suited Her.

A little miss of three years, who livs under the shadows of Hope church, was playing with the neighbors' children one morning, when they (the children) were called in for prayers. She accompanied them, and when seated in the sitting-room, she observed that she was the only one without a book. So she jumped down and helped herself from the bookcase in the room, returned to her chair and opened the book like the others, and endeavored to read, unrequested. After reading, she shut her book, and waited until they had all kneeled, when she assumed a like position, putting her hand to her face, but keeping a lookout between her fingers all the while to observe what was taking place. When the others rose from their knees, she ran over to one of the little girls, and, calling her by name, said: "I like this game first-rate. What is the name of it?"—Springfield Homestead.

Molting Angels.



The bishop was addressing a Sunday-school, and related to the children the story of Jacob's dream of the ladder into heaven. Closing his remarks, he invited them to ask any questions they had in mind. After a few seconds' pause, a little girl in a piping voice inquired, "If the angels had wings, what did they want a ladder for to climb into heaven?" This was a puzzler for the bishop. He cleared his throat several times, grew red in the face, and hesitated; but at last a bright thought struck him. Turning toward the school, he said: "As one little child has asked this question, perhaps some other little child can answer it. Now can any one tell me why the angels wanted a ladder?" Back came the answer from a remote corner of the room, "Because they was molting, sir." The good bishop sat down.

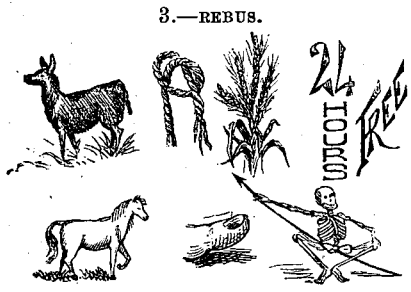
The Five Alls.

"The Five Alls" was at one time a very common tavern sign in England. It consisted of five human fingers, each accompanied by a motto. The first was a king in full regalia, with the legend, "I govern all;" the second a bishop in pontificals, with the motto, "I pray for all;" the third, a lawyer in his gown, with the motto, "I plead for all;" the fourth, a soldier in regimentals, with the motto, "I fight for all;" and the fifth, a poor countryman, with scythe and rake, having for a motto, "I pay for all."

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—REBUS.

What a schoolboy thinks.



2.—CHARADE.

Reverse involved in Rebus.

In "the science of water," O Lord, we must find,
As the two inner syllables backward combined.
Two syllables fence this deific old phrase,
Which one tall letter G as a rebus displays.
Regardless of symmetry, back stretch the cord,
And then in reverse, we may read it, go Lord;
And going, it leaves us two pillars erect,
Which a cross-piece from center to center connect;
Like the pillars of Hermes, they greet our glad eyes—
Leaves us also, for all silly fables, too wise.
"The science of water," which, conscious of God,
Just blushed and turned wine at his presence and nod!
"The science of water," which tells us how he
And a favored disciple walked dry on the sea!
Or how it stood up like a wall for the Jews,
But overwhelmed Pharaoh's host that pursues!
"The science of water," that tells how for him
God's prophet once caused a sunk ax-head to swim!
Of water, of water that hears like a child,
And when Jesus says "peace," at once becomes mild!
Of water that bursts from a rock like a flood!
Of water that turns in its streams into blood!
Of water that heaven's wide windows let drop
To meet the great flood 'neath the earth breaking up,
'Till it covered the earth and destroyed all the race,
Excepting eight people of odorous grace!
O Lord, in such science reversed thou mightst hide!
Go, Lord, 'tis a Freethinker bids thee to slide!
From the presence of man, now a king reason-crowned,
Like a crawfish, retire where old myths most abound,
For science is struck by each miracle sore,
As we know what must but from things gone before,
And unvarying human experience cries
That such miracles told must be fables or lies.
In every science we may clearly perceive
If the God be not banished, to go he has leave;
And instead of a crown on his mythical brow,
'Tis "the cap and the bells" that his godship wears now.

Correspondence.

SAND LAKE, MICH., Nov. 22, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I see there is no letter in the Childrens' Corner in the last TRUTH SEEKER, so I thought I would write one. I am eight years old. I go to school every day. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I love to read the Children's Corner and look at the pictures. I go to Sunday-school. and my teacher tries to scare me about hell, but I only laugh at her. Yours truly,

JAMES J. BERRIDGE.

CALISTOGA, CAL., Nov. 18, 286.

MISS WIXON: Please tell your little friend Francis B. Cornwall that he did not scare me out of the Corner, because you welcomed me there, and I thought there was room for us all. Somehow I like to be among the children. We hav several of them around us, and it seems natural to be where they are. My absence from the Corner has been owing to our son Ralph's sickness. He is still quite unwell, and unable to sit up. We hav had to nurse and watch him so carefully for many weeks, night and day. We hope he may soon recover. I am much pleased to know that one young truth seeker, at least, has missed me, though I am almost a stranger there. I hope to get better acquainted in the future, and if I can add to the happiness of the many truth seeker children I shall feel of some use in the Corner.

I sometimes feel as if I could giv you some sweet, natural songs, or bright, amusing stories; but, somehow, I find myself waiting for others more gifted and freer from care. I do not hav a very high notion of my own ability, or I would be found more frequently in print. I like songs, however, though unable to sing much, and enjoy good stories when others tell them. They go a long way to lighten the cares and misfortunes of life for the old folks, and amuse and interest the young. They are gleams of sunshine, like flowers along our pathway. I am a lover of nature, from her wildest moods to her delicate finger prints on the sunny slopes and frosted window panes. I love the ceaseless roar on the rock-bound coast, and the gentle wash on the sandy shore; the voice of the night wind among the trees, and the joyous songs of many birds; the cultured tones of experience and the merry prattle of children—soft, sweet voices full of richest melody, and heartfelt laughter of anyone. So, fill up the Corner with happy songs, witty stories. words of wisdom, useful thoughts, and all sorts of good things, like ripe apples from the best trees in the orchard, and sweetest nuts from the woodland. UNOLE JOHN.

[We are pleased to hear from Uncle John again, but sorry to learn of the sickness of little Ralph. May he soon be well again.—ED. C.C.]

ELMORE, ILL., Nov. 22, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav seen so many little correspondents in the Children's Corner, I thought I would try and write too. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a good many years. I am fourteen years of age, and am in school now. I study fifth reader, spelling, arithmetic, and geography. I hav never studied grammar yet, but I am going to this winter.

It is a bad day. It is raining now.

Will you excuse bad writing? I will bring my letter to a close. I remain, Yours truly, NELLIE THURMAN.

BURNETT, NEB., Nov. 23, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Seeing no letter in the Children's Corner this week, I thought I would take the pleasure to write one for the first time. Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for nine or ten years. He thinks it is the best paper ever printed in this world. I like the Corresponding part of the Children's Corner best of all. I am fourteen years old, and study nine studies. We liv on a farm in Antelope county, Nebraska, seven miles south of a small village called Burnett. The weather is very cold here now. Well, I will close for this time. Yours ever truly,

ESTELLE WHITNEY.

THOROLD, ONT., Nov. 29, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I think it is a very nice paper. Since I wrote the last letter, I hav not had time to write another. I hav seen so many litttle letters from children that I thought that I would now try another. I am a little boy twelve years old, and I am in the grammar school. I liv in Thorold, and it is a very pleasant place. There are in this town three Protestant churches, one Catholic church, and two public schools. I hav been to all of the schools in the town but the Catholic school. There are not many little Freethinkers in this town. Yonr little friend,

Odds and Ends.

IN a recent sermon Henry Ward Beecher said: "I hav no sympathy with eight-hour men who hav fourteen-hour wives."

"How far can you count, Johnny?" "1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7—let me see—8, 9, 10—" "Good! so far complete. Go on!" "Jack, queen, king." "Take your seat!"

"I'VE just found out why lightning never strikes twice in the same place," said Farmer Furrow to the deacon, as they stood under a tree in a thunderstorm. "Why is it?" said the deacon. "Because, sir, the same place is never there after the lightning once hits it."

IT was at the police court, and it was an assault case. A witness testified that the assault occurred on Sunday. "How do you know it was on a Sunday?" asked the lawyer on the other side. "Because that day I had to go to the back door of the saloon to get my whisky instead of the front door."

TONY MCOWEN remarked to Captain Norris that he sat down to his breakfast every morning at half-past eight. Norris said it seemed odd that he could sit down to his breakfast at half-past eight, for when he got through it was "ate." Whereupon McOwen drew a revolver and shot Norris dead. The jury said justifiable homicide.

SHE wasn't very young, but she had money. He didn't want the earth. "Dearest," he began, but she stopped him. "I anticipate what you are about to say, Mr. Sampson," she said, "and I would spare your feelings, for it can never, never be. I esteem you highly, and will be a sister to—" "I hav four sisters already," he replied bitterly, "four grown sisters, and life is a hideous burden. But, O Clara," he went on passionately, "if you cannot be my wife will you not giv me a mother's protecting love? I'm anorphan."

"CHARLEY," she murmured from the other end of the sofa, "did you read that singular accident in Marysville the other day?" "What accident?" "Well—ahem—you see, the rival of a young man shot into the window of a room where the young man was sitting with his—his steady company, you know, but the bullet str[illegible]k the corset-steel of the young lady—she was [illegible] in his lap, I believe—and so no one was [illegible]h! Charley, do you—do you think you [illegible]se?" Charley said h[illegible] as well not to [illegible]

[illegible] be in-dul-ging in fa-ce-ti-ous comments upon our per-so-nal ap-pear-ance. Now the so-pra-no is getting in her fine work. See that bald-headed man in the front pew smiling at her? He im-agins that he is at a comic opera per-form-ance. Now all four of the singers are at it, and the organ-ist is sitting on the safety-valve of the instru-ment, and has thrown out all the sand bags. How is that for music, children? Ah, now they hav fin-ish-ed! If we were to climb over the screen would we see them all lis-ten-ing at-tentiv-ly to the sermon? No, we would see the sopra-no flirting with the tenor, and the bass and alto reading, and the or-gan-ist asleep.

An Address and a Response.

NOW, BOB, HONOR BRIGHT!—CHARLESTON TO INGERSOLL.

Sept. 1, 1886, After the Earthquake.

Hello! Hel-lo, Central! Hello there!
Is Ingersoll home and alone?
Well, giv him my compliments (Charleston),
And ask him to step to the 'phone.

"Occupied writing a lecture?"
Well, tell him I won't keep him long;
That I'll prove beyond human conjecture
The tack that he sails on is wrong.

. . . . . .

Hello, Bob! I can't grasp your hand,
But, Old Sweepstakes, we'll shake just the same.
"Want assistance?" No, that's not my motiv
In ringing you up, for your name

Will head the first suff'rers' subscription
That's raised to our aid—I wan't none.
Your heart's just as big as your re·ord,
And it's solid on all things but one.

And that is a question of faith, Bob;
A question of heaven and hell;
A question of here and hereafter—
"A chestnut?" Well, don't ring the bell!

"The old, old story's 'a chestnut?'"
Well, it seems to me, Bob, I avow,
Like the latest of inspirations,
As the niggers are singing it now.

What's that? "All faith, all religion
Is born of a feeling of fear?"
But that fear's the beginning of wisdom,
And we've struck the conclusion down here

That the earth is as unsubstantial
As you claim our religion to be.
If you hav any doubts on the subject
You'd better come down here and see

This once happy, desolate city,
Her people insane with despair,
And callling on heaven for pity,
I picture you quoting Voltaire;

I hear you pronouncing the Bible
A tissue of lies, and a-sayin,'
"Now come, honor bright! Oh, what rubbish!"
Distributing works of Tom Paine.

Then I hear in the wail of the people
Certain proof that a God reigns on high;
That there's more to the church than its steeple,
And 'tis you, not the scriptures, that lie.

That there's only one rock we can cling to
That earthquakes and waves will not toss—
One only—the old Rock of Ages,
The pedestal, Bob, of the cross.

I'm a sport, and I've taken big chances;
I used to giv tips on the ring,
You can stake your whole treasure on scripture,
For, Bob, it's a livin', sure thing.

"No?" Well, rail at the errors of Moses,
Find fault with St. Paul and the Acts,
But, if you'd lectured in Charleston last evenin',
Your lynchin' and hell had been facts.

—Geoffrey Hawley.

NOW, GEOF., HONOR BRIGHT!—INGERSOLL TO HAWLEY.

Hello! Hel-lo, Central! Hello there!
Is Hawley at home, and alone?
Well, giv him my compliments (Ingersoll),
And ask him to step to the 'phone.

"Occupied mending a fracture?"
Well, tell him I won't keep him long;
That in spite of his rythmical lecture
I still think I'm right and he wrong.

Hello, Geof.! I don't wan't your hand,
But your brains, if you hav any left,
For you talk like a scared contraband,
Of senses, of reason, bereft.

What a jumble of "faith" and of "chestnuts,"
Of Bible, of Paine, and Voltaire;
What a blending of taffy with "lynchin',"
Of hell, with a poor nigger's prayer.

You assert that the "wail of the people"
Is "proof that a God reigns on high,"
That "there's more to the church than its steeple,"
And 'tis I, "not the scriptures, that lie."

Such logic is wordy confusion,
Your abuse—for that I don't care;
But I venture to hold this conclusion,
The wail was a proof—of a scare.

A faith that is born of an earthquake
Is a mighty uncertain affair,
The "rock' that I lean on is reason,
Wise action is better than prayer.

It is bosh, that the wail of a people
Is a proof that a God reigns on high,
But there's more to the church than its steeple,
That axiom none will deny.

Yes, a selfish, intolerant priesthood,
A faith, that is fathered by fear,
Superstition, the mildew of reason,
And hell, with its horrors, are there.

A priesthood incessantly begging,
Taking even the poor widow's mite;
Activ workers for wrong and the devil,
While shouting for God and the right.

Man lost by a slight misdemeanor,
Redeemed by a crime, is their creed,
While justice stands by in amazement,
And morality shudders indeed.

You may "wail" at each seismical antic,
Get almost insane with despair,
Petition your God until frantic,
He hears not, nor answers your prayer.

I remember a terrible cyclone
In whose path was a domicil, where,
All huddled in fear and excitement,
Were maidens—young, pious, and fair.

Some fell on their knees and in prayer,
Asked God to protect them from harm,
But one crept in under the bedstead,
And hid from the God and the storm.

And while the sweet maidens were kneeling
The storm tore the roof from its hold,
And, God and his mercy defying,
Carried death to that innocent fold.

The maiden who trusted the bedstead,
Nor prayed as she crouched 'neath its shield,
She lived through the tempest's wild fury,
While her God-trusting sisters were killed.

Now, Geoffrey, just listen to reason,
Come down from your faith to hard fact,
This earth, when it feels in the humor,
Will freely expand or contract.

And we, insignificant earthworms,
Wise little fools, though we be,
If we get in the way of the ruction,
Hav got to go with it—d'ye see?

We may "wail" at the earthquake's destruction,
No God can or will interfere,
So the best we can do, I opine, is
To hav a good time while we're here.

But, Geof., if your faith gives you comfort,
Hold on, I will never assail,
But don't say I lie if I cannot,
Like you, hear a God in a wail.

For Geof., this is true, honest Ingin,
Without e'en a tincture of chaff;
A wail is the voice of the devil,
My God I would find in a laugh.

The gods of the ignorant past
Were thicker that peas in a pod,
And all but this mythical last
Hav been vanquished by Science's rod.

Apotheosized ignorance! all—
All scattered like chaff in the wind;
One, only one left, to enthral,
To hinder the triumph of mind.

This anthropological God,
Unstable, capricious, and cruel,
I'd believe in and trust just as soon
As I would the rear end of a mule.

The power that controls is internal,
Universal and all-filling soul;
I must, not I will, is the edict
Of the mighty, magnificent whole.

You may call that a God, if it suits you,
I bow full of love, void of fear;
And, Geof., with my reason for compass,
On no other "tack" will I steer.

New York, Nov. 15, 1886. WM. WHITTICK.

P.S.—You're "a sport," and hav "taken big chances,"
In fact, hav been quite a wild lad,
Your "tips on the ring" may be daisies,
But your tips on religion are bad. W. W.

Robert the Devil

ON DANIEL AND THE LIONS, PARTICULARLY THE LIONS.

"Robert," said the editor of Gabe's Horn to me the other day, "what do you consider the best policy for mankind to follow?"—you see he had lost a cigar from his desk, and I think he was suspicious that I had got away with it, but didn't dare to say so, not having any proof, you see.

"For Christians," said I, "the best policy to follow is hypocrisy, and they all follow it from the word Go, and to the last man in the line. I think I shall evolute to a Christian some day, because hypocrisy is the winning hand every time."

He gave me a frigid stare that would hav stopped ice-cream from melting on a hot plate, but didn't say anything. You see, I've got the bulge on him, because the old man, my dad, owns most of Gabe's Horn, is a holy pillar of the church, and does what he's a mind to with the paper. But I know what he'd a liked to said, only he dasn't, which is, "You infernal freckle-faced devil, git outer here, quick!" And I know what he'd a liked to done, only he dasn't, which is, Booted me outer the sanctum and chucked the ink bottle after me. Oh, I've got the bulge on the duffer, you bet!

In a minute or two he began to stroke his long gray chinners, and then said, soft and sweet as molasses, "Robert, your eyes will be opened one of these days, and you will see the gate of the fold and come in and be numbered among Gideon's glorious band——"

"And hav a uniform?" said I, busting in on him.

"Yes," said he, "the uniform of the godly, which is brighter than gold and jewels, and you will be resplendent."

"But you couldn't hock that uniform for a cent," said I; "Simpson wouldn't ante up a shilling on the uniforms of the whole band." Then I had to explain what "hock" was, and who Simpson was; and he said he was afraid the scales wouldn't drop off my eyes until I reached the age of understanding; but as he said it mild—I know he wanted to boot me all the same, but dasn't—and hoped the scales would drop off soon, I thought it would be a good time to show him another piece I had written about one of the Holy Munchausen stories, and did. He read it, but said it wouldn't do to print in Gabriel's Horn, for obvious reasons, which kind of reasons I didn't understand, but didn't let him know I didn't, you bet. What I had writ about was

DANIEL IN THE LIONS' DEN.

It is related in the Holy Munchausen for a true fact, that Daniel was thrown into the lions' den and come out of it as though nothing had happened, not getting a bite or a scratch.

A good many swallow this yarn whole, a good many choke at it, and a good many more don't take any stock into it at all. If everybody knew a lion's gait, which is to get all the raw meat he can, especially man meat, nobody would swallow the yarn, and everybody would be ashamed to tell it for a fact, except Mark Twain and Eli Perkins, who mostly deal in such ridiculous yarns.

If Daniel—why didn't they give his other name? There might have been forty Daniels living on the same block; and saying Daniel was chucked into the lion's den is saying nothing, as I look at it. But if there ever was a Daniel chucked into a lions' den, and come out alive and kicking, you can bet it's a dead sure thing the lions weren't A.1, simon-pure, copper-fastened, double-back-action lions of the African jungles—the genuin, hair-spring, self-cocking revolvers of the desert, you know!

I've seen a picture of Daniel in the den sitting on a rock wrapped in a table-cloth—Daniel was so got up, not the rock—and he looked quite serene, as though he was at a Quaker meeting, while the head lion of the congregation sat on his haunches, looking every inch a grave old judge as he gazed at Dan with a look that seemed to say, "What is your business before this high court, young man?" while the lesser lions—the officers and clerks of the court—looked at Dan indifferently, and as though they never indulged in man meat, or dreamed it was fit food for a lion's stomach, which ain't true to lion nature.

If them lions had been of the roaring, high-pressure, three-ply, dyed-in-the-wool sort that go about seeking whom they may devour, we never should hav had the picture of "Daniel in the Lions' Den," with Dan in the leading role, because he would hav been gobbled up before the artist, Onthespot, could hav taken his picture; and Dan never would hav known whether he made a square meal for the lions or not. It isn't likely that he or any other man would, for there were five or six lions there, and one man wouldn't go far among six lions, if they felt at all peckish. It would be about the same as setting one woodcock before six men that felt peckish.

No, them lions weren't the genuin, triple X, three-ply, yard wide, warranted-to-wash Muldoons of the desert, but some of Van Amburgh's or Barnum's played-out stock, toothless and tired, like some of the dizzy specimens of our Central Park Zoo, whose taste for man meat has died out.

If they were healthy and hearty lions, with good teeth and toe-nails, and hadn't been stuffed full of raw beef, then Dan What'shisname was never chucked into 'em, and I'll bet on it. Lions is lions, when healthy, and man meat is their delight. SI SLOKUM.

Book Notice.

KELSO'S NEW BOOK.

I hav been reading with much interest Brother Kelso's new book, "Spiritualism Sustained."

, be he Christian, Spiritualist, or Agnostic. Every Christian should read it in order to "see himself as others see him."

I regard Brother Kelso as a very astute writer. His book bristles with sharp points. Almost every paragraph cracks some theological nut, and shows that the kernel is wanting or moldy, and unfit for a clean stomach. The horns of some of the dilemmas gore the very life blood out of the Christian, and often leave him in the most ludicrous predicament.

For fear of making this article too long, a single quotation must suffice to giv a clew to the general tenor of the five lectures which comprise the book: "If, however, by the term Infidelity you mean the manly use of our reason and our common sense, intensified by priestly denunciation and absurd creeds, then I freely admit that all Spiritualists are, to a greater or less extent, tinctured with Infidelity. They undeniably do, as a class, rank very high as Freethinkers and correct reasoners. It is not so much the embracing of Spiritualism, however, that leads them to become Freethinkers and correct reasoners as it is the exercising of Freethought and correct reasoning that leads them to embrace Spiritualism. Persons who either cannot or dare not think for themselvs never become either Spiritualists or Infidels. Such persons on faith alone piously swallow whatever their priests may see fit to put into their mouths, and, as a natural consequence of such pious compliance, they nearly always die firm believers in the religion with which they may happen to hav been stuffed, no matter how absurd or degrading that religion may be. For obvious reasons such persons never make any progress. Indeed, founded as it is upon an unchangeable God, and upon an unchangeable book, Christianity itself, if unperverted, is of necessity totally incapable of change, of progress, or improvement. . . . It necessarily tends to lead us back into the darkness, the ignorance, the superstition of the gloomy past, and to shut out the light, the learning, and the mental freedom of the brighter present. Denouncing as the most damnable Infidelity all rejections of its doctrins or its models, all departures from them and all advances beyond them, it necessarily tends to keep alive among us the foul principles of slavery, of bigotry, of cruelty, of polygamy, of concubinage, etc., which constitute the most prominent characteristics of its principal God, and its most noted models. It claims in thus leading us back into the customs of the times in which these principles prevailed, it is leading us into the simplicity and the innocence with which God is best pleased. It teaches us that the farther we go back into the misty distance of the past, the nearer to God we find the people, and that the more we progress the more we differ from those people, the farther we depart from God and from the hope of salvation. All this, as you must plainly perceive, is bound to render the Christian religion the most formidable of all enemies to every form of progress and improvement. And does not the whole history of its course prove that this view is correct? For ten centuries it had full sway over the fairest portions of earth, and, because of the universal prevalence of ignorance, and crime, and wretchedness during their continuance, those ten centuries col

Parallels in Other Religions
Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It is unquestionable true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us."—N. Y. Sun.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

A STUDY OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY

BY LEWIS G. JANES.

This book treats of the natural evolution of the Christian religion, its historical antecedents in Palestinian Judaism and Roman Paganism; investigates the history of the founder of Christianity in the light of the latest scientific criticism of the New Testament; shows that the true story of the Man Jesus, and his genuin teachings are separable from the later legendary accretions which hav confounded him with the mythical Christ, and traces the natural development of Christian dogma and ecclesiastical institutions. Complete references and full index. 320pp. 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price $1.50.

"SHOPPEL'S MODERN HOUSES" No. 3.

(Just Published, July 1, 1886) CONTAINS:

A colored frontispiece showing the modern style of painting.

A cardboard supplement, ingeniously drawn and colored, to supply all the neccessary pieces for constructing a model house, with plain directions for putting them together.

While the supplement affords both old and young the greatest amusement, it is more than a toy. It is, in fact, a most practical lesson in Architecture; a perfect, scaled model of one of our most popular designs, so exact that it is useful to builders.

55 New Designs for Residences (cost varying from $500 to $15,000).
2 New Designs for Barns.
1 New Design for a Chapel.
Drawings and description of a model Kitchen (by Maria Parloa) and a perfect Cistern.
An Article on Villa Park Associations.

A MIRACLE is a violation of the laws of nature, and as a firm and unalterable experiences has established these laws, the proof against a miracle, from the very nature of the fact, is as entire as any argument from experience can possibly be imagined. Why is it more than probable that all men must die; that lead cannot of itself remain suspended in the air; that fire consumes wood and is extinguished by water; unless it be that these events are found agreeable to the laws of nature, and there is required a violation of these laws, or, in other words, a miracle, to prevent them? Nothing is esteemed a miracle if it ever happen in the common course of nature. It is no miracle that a man seemingly in good health should die on a sudden, because such a kind of death, though more unusual than any other, has yet been frequently observed to happen. But it is a miracle that a dead man should come to life, because that has never been observed in any age or country. There must, therefore, be a uniform experience against every miraculous event, otherwise the event would not merit that appellation. —Hume's Essay on Miracles.

SINCE miracles are effects contrary to the established constitution of things, we are certain that they will never be performed on trivial occasions.—T. H. Horne.

[For the proof of this assertion let the intelligent student turn to the gospels and read the account of Christ's cursing the fig-tree because it had no fruit, but leaves only, "the time for fruit being not yet come," and to his sending Peter to catch a fish in whose mouth he should find a penny. More "trivial" occasions of exercising divine power it would be difficult to conceive. Miracles are nowadays seldom appealed to, except by the very canaille of popular preachers —the very gutter-snipes of theology—but, before Hume's time, miracles and prophecy were the pillars on which the temple of Christianity rested. Other religions as well as the Jewish and Christian appeal to miracles, and they are quite as well attested as those that we read in the Old and New Testaments.—Hytax.]

BY some we are told that the soul is immaterial, and that, by reason of its immateriality, it cannot die. How can human beings, professing to hav cultivated their understandings, be content to respect, and rest in, such wretched inanities as these, at best but the convulsiv flounderings of an intellect out of its depth, deluding itself into the belief that it has grasped an idea when it has only got hold of a word? That the immaterial must, of necessity, be immortal seems to us an unmeaning assertion in a matter of which we know absolutely nothing. Of the nature of the soul science has taught us indeed little—far too little to allow us to decide and dogmatize—but honesty must admit that the little it has taught us all points to an opposit conclusion. Alas! for the spirit's immortal trust, if it rested on such scholastic trivialties as these!—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

IN revelation, technically so-called, revelation confirmed by historical miracles, Carlyle was unable to believe—he felt himself forbidden to believe by the light which was in him. In other ages men had seen miracles when there were none, and had related them in perfect good faith in their eagerness to realize the divine presence in the world. They di l not know enough of nature to be on their guard against alleged suspensions of its unvarying order. To Carlyle the universe was itself a miracle, and all its phenomena were equa'ly in themselves incomprehensible. But the special miraculous occurrences of sacred history were not credible to him. "It is as certain as mathematics," he said to me late in his own life, "that no such thing ever has been or can be."—Froude's Carlyle.

AND why even of yourselvs judge ye not what is right?—Jesus.

IN the massacre of St. Bartholomew five thousand Parisians of all ranks were murdered. Within the whole kingdom the number of victims was variously estimated at from twenty-five thou sand to one hundred thousand. The heart of Protestant Europe, for an instant, stood still with horror. The queen of England put on mourning weeds, and spurned the apologies of the French envoy with contempt. At Rome, on the contrary, the news of the massacre created a joy beyond description. The pope, accompanied by his cardinals, went solemnly to the church of St. Mark to render thanks to God for the grace thus singularly vouchsafed to the Holy See and to all Christendom, and a Te Deum was performed in presence of the same august assemblage.—Motley's Rise of the Dutch Republic.

A PAROCHIAL SCHOOL LESSON.

Notes and Clippings.

A CATHOLIC paper says that the Freemasons of Italy hav resolved to use all their influence with the deputies on the left to hav the first article of the statutes repealed. The article alluded to is one declaring that the Roman Catholic and Apostolic church shall be the religion of the kingdom.

THE largest number of Chinese employed at any one place on the Eastern slope are employed in Casebolt's laundry in Belleville, on the outskirts of Newark. District No. 51 of the Knights of Labor hav entered into an agreement with Mr. Casebolt to supply him with white laborers, and the latter has agreed to take them on in place of the Chinamen.

THOSE abuses of the freedom of speech are the exercises of liberty. They ought to be repressed, but to whom dare we commit the care of doing it? An evil magistrate, intrusted with power to punish for words, would be armed with a weapon the most destructiv and terrible. Under pretense of pruning off the exuberant branches, he would be apt to destroy the tree.—Benjamin Franklin.

THE first person that Mr. Mohini Chatterji, the celebrated Buddhist philosopher, called upon when he reached this country, says the Sun, was Laura C. Holloway, who is deeply interested in Buddhism. She lives in Brooklyn, and it is at her house that Miss Rose Elizabeth Cleveland often stops when she comes in from the country. Mrs. Holloway is a well-to-do woman, an authoress of note, a bright and well-informed conversationalist, and a Freethinker.

THE Savannah News says that Sam Jones has a brother who is preaching in the northern part of Georgia. He tries to outdo his brother in the use of vigorous language, and is said to employ a dialect that will almost take the bark of a hickory tree. Decorating a hickory tree is not much of an elocutionary job, but separating a Georgian from his sin requires real fervent use of the maxillary.

WE are half a mind to begin to write a story that may never end, founded on facts that are ever obvious. Hippodromus, taking his morning walk in the streets of Lucignano, comes upon Theodectes, a laborer, and says to him: "Why are you always at work?" Theodectes answers: "I am always at work to get money to buy food to giv me strength to do more work that I may get more money to buy more food to get more strength to do more work to get more money to buy more food to get more strength to do more work to get more money to buy—" This is the beginning of the story without end, and the facts on which it is founded, they are without end also.—Winsted Press.

AN interesting fable has long been in circulation that the queen presented a Bible to an African chief, saying to him that it was "the source of England's greatness." A picture of the presentation of the Bible by the queen to the savage was actually published. Mrs. Besant has exploded the fable. An African chief sent a present to the queen, and the queen directed the president of the Church Missionary Society to write to him and thank him and send him two Bibles. There was no presentation, no saying. The whole fable has grown up out of a phrase used by the president in his letter: "England has become great and happy by the knowledge of the true God and Jesus Christ." The president does not pretend that this is even a message from the queen. Thus do pious stories grow!

THE Rev. H. R. Haweis has made a sensation in London by a sermon preached a week since, in which he denounced the church at large for its bigotry, ridiculed the idea of apostolic succession, declared that he didn't believe a word of the Athanasian creed, and expressed himself as only lukewarm in his adhesion to the Thirty-nine Articles of faith. Mr. Haweis's audience sat aghast at the succession of heresies hurled at them by the preacher.

A MOST startling statement, and most monstrous if true, is that at Portree a child has been distrained on, or poinded, as the Scotch term the seizure for arrears of rent. Although this is on the property of, and for rent due to, Lord Macdonald, it is not suggested that he is to blame, but the Scotch sheriff's officer who poinded the child "for sale" must hav strange notions of landlord's rights, and it is hardly wonderful that there is "much indignation amongst the Highlanders."—National Reformer.

MR. ALBERT WORRELL, who livs in an old house in Campbell county, Va., a few days since found behind a loosened mantelpiece an old newspaper, the Boston Gazette of March 12, 1770, which had on it in pencil the name of Thomas Jefferson. At that time Mr. Jefferson owned lands in Campbell, and often visited the neighborhood. It is probable that he was a subscriber to the paper, and loaned this copy to one of his neighbors. It contains several protests by public meetings against the purchase by the people of tea and other importations of British goods, also a long account of the killing of certain citizens by British soldiers.—Baltimore American.

JUDGE DEMING, of the New Haven, Conn., City Court, gave a decision last week in the case of the state against Albert O. Norton, a clothing merchant, who offered to purchasers of his goods a lot of prizes to be given to those persons making the most correct guesses at the number of seeds in a big pumpkin. This, it was claimed, was contrary to law, and the case excited much interest because has not been a fair given in the state for years the manager of which has not done just what Mr. Norton did, or something like it. Judge Deming found Norton guilty, and sentenced him to pay $50 fine. An appeal was taken to the Superior Court.

THE French hav encountered the difficulty that troubles this country in the matter of religious instruction in the public schools, but they seem to be making more rapid progress in the direction of solving the problem. The law respecting primary education recently passed by the French Assembly had already been voted by that body at the last session, and was returned by the Senate for the modification of sundry articles. The chief point of the law is its enforcement of absolute secularity of instruction. Hence it is, of course, bitterly opposed by the Monarchists and Ultramontanes, who denounce it with floods of adjectivs like "odious," "abominable," "blasphemous," and the like. But the purely secular primary school is the only one which can, under national support, gather in representativs of all classes of French youth, and there is every probability that the measure will soon become a law.—Christian at Work.

The Fathers of Our Republic.

FRANKLIN.

In his autobiography, Franklin says:

Some books against Deism fell into my hands; they were said to be the substance of the sermons preached at Baylis's lectures. It happened that they wrought an effect on me quite contrary to what was intended by them. For the arguments of the Deists, which were quoted to be refuted, appeared to me to be much stronger than the refutation. In short, I soon became a thorough Deist (Autobiography, p. 166).

This occurred when he was quite young, and there is no evidence that his opinions underwent any material change afterward.

Franklin's biographer, Parton, says:

In conversation with familiar friends he called himself a Deist or Theist (Life of Franklin, vol. i, p. 319).

He escaped the theology of terror and became forever incapable of worshiping a jealous, revengeful, and vindictiv God (Ibid, p. 71).

At the age of eighty-four, just previous to his death, in reply to inquiries concerning his religious belief from the president of Yale College, he wrote as follows:

Here is my creed: I believe in one God, the creator of the universe. That he governs it by his providence. That he ought to be worshiped. That the most acceptable service we render him is doing good to his other children. That the soul of man is immortal, and will be treated with justice in another life respecting its conduct in this.

This is pure Deism. Paine and Voltaire would hav readily subscribed to every one of the above six articles of faith. Compare the creed of Franklin with the creed of Paine.

It is not improbable that Franklin had much to do with shaping the Deistic belief of Paine. Parton says:

Paine was a resident of Philadelphia, a frequenter of Franklin's house, and was as well aware as we are of Dr. Franklin's religious opinions (Life of Franklin, vol. ii, p. 553).

For nearly half a century there has been a story afloat to the effect that Franklin attempted to dissuade Paine from publishing his "Age of Reason." This canard, under the caption of "Don't Unchain the Tiger," was published by the American Tract Society, an institution that enjoys the unenviable reputation of having disseminated more unadulterated falsehoods than any other publishing house in America. To properly appreciate this story it is only necessary to recall the fact that Franklin had been dead three years before a page of Paine's work was written. Upon this and his motion for prayers in the Constitutional Convention, is based the Christian piety of Franklin. Regarding the latter, it is only necessary to remark that it was in harmony with the second and third articles of his Deistic creed.

Dr. Franklin and Dr. Priestley were intimate friends. Of Franklin, Priestley writes:

It is much to be lamented that a man of Franklin's general good character and great influence should hav been an unbeliever in Christianity, and also hav done as much as he did to make others unbelievers" (Priestley's Autobiography, p. 60).

This great man was himself denounced as an Infidel. He was a Unitarian of the most advanced type, and was mobbed and driven from England on account of his heretical opinions and his sympathy with the French Revolution. Franklin's Infidelity must hav been of a very radical character to hav provoked the censures of Dr. Priestley.

While in France, Franklin consorted chiefly with Freethinkers, among whom were Mirabeau, D'Holbach, D'Alembert, Buffon, and Condorcet. Respecting his religious belief, Parton classes him with Goethe, Schiller, Voltaire, Hume, and Jefferson, and says they would all hav belonged to the same church.

Franklin and Voltaire, a few months before the death of the latter, met for the first time at a theater in Paris. On being introduced, they cordially shook hands. But this was not enough. Each then clasped the other in his arms, and for a moment held him in an affectionate embrace. It was not a mere formal meeting between two aged philosophers; a deeper significance attached to the interesting scene. It was the spontaneous outburst of kindred feelings and a common faith. It was the Deism of the New World, through its most illustrious representativ, saluting that of the Old.

In regard to the Bible, Franklin, like other Freethinkers, admired some portions of it and condemned other parts of it. He asserts that "there are several things in the Old Testament impossible to be given by divine inspiration." For the amusement of his friends, he often caricatured the Bible by taking it up, and, pretending to read from it, extemporized in a ludicrous manner as he went along.

The character of Jesus he extolled, but in regard to his divinity he declared himself a skeptic.

In a letter to the Rev. George Whitefield, written in 1753, we hav his opinion of Christianity:

The faith you mention has doubtless its use in the world. I do not desire to see it diminished, nor would I desire to lessen it in any way; but I wish it were more productiv of good works than I hav generally seen it. I mean real good works, works of kindness, charity, mercy, and public spirit, not holy-day keeping, sermon hearing and reading, performing church ceremonies, or making long prayers, filled with flatteries and compliments, despised even by wise men, and much less capable of pleasing the deity.

Writing to his sister in 1758, he says:

'Tis pity that good works, among some sorts of people are so little valued, and good words admired in their stead. I mean seemingly pious discourses, instead of humane, benevolent actions. These they almost put out of countenance by calling morality, rotten morality; righteousness, ragged righteousness, and even filthy rags, and when you mention virtue, pucker up their noses; at the same time that they eagerly snuff up an empty, canting harang, as if it were a posy of the choicest flowers.

Franklin believed in a future state of existence, but his conception of immortality was that of the Deist and not of the Christian. In his letter to Whitefield, previously alluded to, he says:

By heaven we understand a state of happiness, infinit in degree and eternal in duration. I can do nothing to deserve such a reward. He that, for giving a draught of water to a thirsty person, should expect to be paid with a good plantation, would be modest in his demands compared with those who think they deserve heaven for the little good they do on earth; . . . for my part, I hav not the vanity to think I deserve it, the folly to expect, or the ambition to desire it.

In a letter to Mrs. Partridge, he observes:

With regard to future bliss, I cannot help imagining that multitudes of the zealously orthodox of different sects, who at the last day may flock together in hopes of seeing each other damned, will be disappointed, and obliged to rest content with their own salvation.

The following extract from a letter to Jared Ingersoll, written in 1762, shows how he regarded the Christian Sabbath:

When I traveled in Flanders, I thought of your excessivly strict observation of Sunday, and that a man could hardly travel on that day among you upon his lawful occasions without hazard of punishment, while where I was everyone traveled, if he pleased, or diverted himself in any other way; and in the afternoon both high and low went to the play or the opera, where there was plenty of singing, fiddling, and dancing. I looked around for God's judgments, but saw no signs of them. The cities were well built and full of inhabitants, the markets filled with plenty, the people well favored and well clothed, the fields well tilled, the cattle fat and strong, the fences, houses, and windows all in repair, and no "old tenor," anywhere in the country, which would make one almost suspect that the deity was not so angry at that offense as a New England justice.

In a letter to Dr. Price he has this to say of religious tests:

I think they were invented, not so much to secure religion itself as the emoluments of it. When a religion is good, I conceive it will support itself; and when it does not support itself, and God does not take care to support it, so that its professors are obliged to call for help of the civil power, 'tis a sign, I apprehend, of its being a bad one.

The above was written in 1780. It is as true today as it was a century ago, and I respectfully commend it to the prayerful consideration of those pious fanatics who, under the mask of temperance and other reforms, are endeavoring to hav religious tests incorporated into our national Constitution.

Clerical conceit and arrogance receive the following merited rebuke from his pen:

Nowadays we hav scarcely a little parson that does not think it the duty of every man within his reach to sit under his petty ministration, and that whoever omits this offends God. To such I wish more humility.

On one occasion, when Whitefield visited this country, he wrote to Franklin, stating that the friend with whom he expected to lodge in Philadelphia had left the city. Franklin very naturally tendered him the hospitalities of his home. Referring to Whitefield's acceptance, he writes:

He replied that, if I made that offer for Christ's sake, I should not miss of a reward. And I returned, "Don't let me be mistaken; it was not for Christ's sake, but for your sake." One of our common acquaintance jocosely remarked that, knowing it to be the custom of the saints, when they received any favor, to shift the burden of the obligation from off their own shoulders and place it in heaven, I had contrived to fix it on earth.

At the age of eighty, in a letter to Mr. Vaughn, of England, he paid the following tribute to the character of heretics:

Remember me affectionately to good Dr. Price, and to the honest heretic, Dr. Priestley. I do not call him honest by way of distinction, for I think all the heretics I hav known hav been virtuous men. They hav the virtue of fortitude, or they could not venture to own their heresy; and they cannot afford to be deficient in any of the other virtues, as that would giv advantage to their many enemies; and they hav not, like orthodox sinners, such a number of friends to excuse or justify them. Do not, however, mistake me. It is not to my good friend's heresy that I impute his honesty. On the contrary, 'tis his honesty that brought upon him the character of a heretic.

Such were the religious opinions of Franklin. The Christian may, with Dr. Priestly, lament that this learned man "should hav been an unbeliever in Christianity;" but, notwithstanding his lamentations, the fact remains. He may distort it, but he cannot disprove it. As Dr. Wilson said of Washington, so must it be said of Franklin—"He was a Deist, and nothing more."

MR. But who can doubt this? . . . It [the skepticism that now prevails] is a serious skepticism, the grounds for which, even those who do not share it, if they are instructed and open-minded, can olny too well understand.—Toronto Week.

An Orthodox Fraud.

II.

While Catholicism originated this scheme of salvation which was largely the work of St. Augustine, Protestantism accepted it, and has for nearly five hundred years directed all its forces to sustain and propagate the fraud. It is singular that educated, intelligent men—men of science and philosophy—could allow themselvs to be duped, imposed upon, and made the champions and defenders of this mythical, fabulous scheme called Christianity. Now that the revisers of the New Testament tell us there were no personages or characters called Christ, or Lord, or Savior, or Belial, in the first or older copies of that volume, they hav openly admitted the forgery of these names by the church, and that on this forgery the whole system or scheme is built. The earlier disciples or followers of Jesus and his teachings, the Ebionites, his Jewish converts and their descendants of Palestine, discarded the miraculous character the Greek writers gave to Jesus in what was orighnally written of him by men who never saw or heard him. What they wrote of hearsay and tradition was compiled some one hundred and fifty years after it is claimed he was crucified.

These writings were the original gospels, and they purport to be a record of some of the things he said and did. But they had none of these deified names now in our English Testament, nor none of the miracles or thaumaturgic acts there ascribed to him. So the revisers tell us they hav discovered in their researches, and in the Companion they say: "The Greek word répas, which properly means miracle, occurs but three times in the gospels, and never with reference to the works which Christ performed." Yet they hav retained in their revision these miracles, as though Jesus had really performed them, when they say they never occurred, according to the Greek text. Then these miracles are forgeries, put there to make us believe that Jesus was a god or supernatural being, and as such capable of performing the miracle of redeeming us from sin, and saving our souls from sheol. With these supernatural personages invented, with the miracles they performed at hand, all the requisits were furnished to build up our faith, our system of religion, called Christianity.

The first book ever printed was the Bible, in the year 1452, and in the Latin, then called the Vulgate. The Bible had long been used in the western church in manuscript copies, and only in the Latin. The Greek language was very imperfectly known to the-ologians.

A Spanish cardinal attempted to furnish a copy of the New Testament in Greek, which was printed in 1520. Erasmus, though encumbered by other literary labors, prepared in the short space of ten months an edition of the Greek New Testament, which was printed in 1516. He issued five editions, making several hundred changes.

Robert Stephens followed Erasmus closely in an edition, adhering to his text, when opposed to the authority of all the manuscripts, and published his fourth edition in 1551. In this edition, for the first time, the New Testament is divided into verses, an invention of Stephens. Stephens made the first collection of various readings, amounting to 2,194.

Beza, the Reformer or Protestant, edited a copy of the Greek Testament, and published five editions, which were based throughout on the text of Stephens. His last edition was in 1598.

The revisers tell us all these Greek copies, so different among themselvs, and in their numerous editions, "began with Erasmus, whose resources were meager indeed, and that even the materials he had were not fully utilized." He said himself that his first edition "was rather tumbled into the world than edited."

Erasmus copied in his edition from some cursiv manuscripts of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, all spurious copies. "He had thus no documentary materials for publishing a complete edition of the Greek Testament," say the revisers. They also say that in the Greek text, from which our authorized version now in common use was formed, there are many words conjecturally re-translated from the Vulgate, "for which no authority can be pleaded, but which are entirely due to the learning and imagination of Erasmus." Scholars hav been unable to ascertain how, and from what sources, and what manuscripts, Erasmus pretended to form his copy; but it must hav been, from the internal evidence of its spuriousness, some modern and not well known copy or copies.

The revisers tell us that Stephens and Beza left the text substantially, if not quite, verbatim, as they had received it from Erasmus. They knew of no old copies, and did not care to know or use any but the most corrupted later copies then in use.

The "Companion" says: "In these circumstances can it be wondered at that vast multitudes of changes will be found in the revised English version, owing to an amended text? When we trace, as has been briefly done, the parentage of our English Bible, and when we see on what a slender basis of authority it rests, we might well fear that the alterations requiring to be made in the Bible with which we hav all our days been familiar, should be of the most revolutionary character."

After telling us that the names Christ, Belial, Lord, God, and Savior, as representing personalities, should never hav been translated and in the Bible as such, and that Jesus never performed those miracles attributed to him, and of innumerable mistranslations, interpolations, omissions, and gross perversions, in consequence of a misuse or indiscriminate use of the moods and tenses of verbs, and of the articles, pronouns, and prepositions, often making the text state positiv falsehoods, impossibilities, absurdities, and nonsense, all of which they own and hav pointed out in examples to the reader—they tell us that, after all their vast labor for ten years, and the many slight changes they hav made in the revision, "no doctrin in the faith is in the slightest degree affected." "The Bible remains for all practical purposes totally unaffected."

Owning that they have made no material changes, having left all these personifications and miracles which they hav pronounced false, with most of the other errors, in the text, they proceed to stultify themselvs and their readers as follows: "No suspicion need in future haunt them that the scriptural truths which they love are insecure." "Hereafter every loyal Christian heart should surely rejoice to hav access, in as pure a form as possible, to the message sent us by our father in heaven;" and add, "The fulfilment of this is presented in the revised version."

What other conclusion can we come to but that the revisers were so disappointed, so embarassed and confounded in the task they had undertaken, that the only way they could extricate themselvs from the formidable difficulty was to contradict themselvs continually, and to escape from the dilemma the best they could by special pleading, by pointing out and defining the errors, wholesale, and then leaving them in the text, declaring then how near perfect the revision had been made, when they knew and confessed the contrary was the fact, and that they purposely meant to leave it so? What cool, quiet, impudent presumption! What innocent, confiding trust in the credulity and stupidity of their readers!

If any one has some lingering doubts about this whole system of orthodoxy being a fraud, let him read these "Companions" critically, and he cannot fail to be convinced, so strong and positiv is the testimony they furnish, that the whole system of orthodox Christianity is an invention of superstition, and these scriptures hav been made to sustain it.

In the Enemy's Camp.

A CHARITABLE OPINION.

From the Independent of Nov. 25th.

It is very hard work, somehow, for confessed Infidelity to raise money for its purposes. It had in this city some years ago an organization called "The First Congregational Society of Humanity," but it broke down for lack of funds. But one of its people has died and given it ten thousand dollars, which he could not keep any longer himself, and so they hav started again under their acknowledged chief priest, Mr. T. B. Wakeman. He preached his first sermon to the reorganized society last Sunday, and talked to them about Constructiv Liberalism, the four corner-stones of which new theology were: "God—the universe; Christ—man; the Virgin Mother—woman and womanhood; the Holy Ghost—love, charity, every attribute that draws man to man and leads him to love his neighbor as himself." With these four corner-stones he proposed to raise a structure that would replace all the fables and traditions now accepted by the churches as the basis of the old religion. We fear the ten thousand dollars can't do all that.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT THE OCEAN GROVE SUMMER CONVENTION OF THE NATIONAL REFORM ASSOCIATION.

Resolved, That nations are moral persons, and as such are accountable to God, and are under the obligations of his law. That the divine law, as revealed to nations, demands their allegiance and submission to the Lord Jesus Christ, into whose hands the moral government of this world has been committed by the father, and who is expressly declared to be the "king of kings and Lord of lords," and "the prince of the kings of the earth." That nations are punished or rewarded, preserved or destroyed, according as they obey or disregard the moral laws which God has revealed for their guidance in his word.

Resolved, That under the law of Christ as king of kings the nation is solemnly bound to respect and defend the sacredness of the holy Sabbath; that the preservation of the Sabbath in this country is essential to the maintenance of our free institutions; and that we recommend all Christian citizens to use their influence in the formation of party platforms to secure a recognition of this great principle.

Resolved, That in any system of public education the nation is bound to teach its future citizens these moral and religious principles in which the very life of the nation consists; and that the exclusion of the Bible by law, from our public schools, already accomplished in many places, is a blow at the foundations of the republic.

Resolved, That a written constitution for a Christian nation ought to contain explicit evidence of the Christian character of the people which frames it; and that the Constitution of the United States ought to be so amended as to declare that this is a Christian nation, and to place all Christian laws, institutions, and usages in our government on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land.

PERNICIOUS ACTIVITY.

From the Christian Statesman.

The growth of the National Reform movement has brought us to a most interesting stage in its history. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has shown a gratifying readiness to accept the principles and coöperate in the work of the National Reform Association. Two additional district secretaries, from branches of the church not heretofore represented in its working force, stand ready to enter the field in September next. They undertake the work upon conditions which argue, on their part, the highest measure of zeal and courage and faith. All the other secretaries will be employed in new territory throughout the year. The National Reform Association is enrolling nearly a hundred volunteer lecturers, who will undertake to deliver each a certain number of volunteer addresses during the year. They, and the friends who arrange for them, will not wait for the coming of the secretaries, but will hold themselvs pledged to keep the cause alive in their own localities, and to carry it steadily into new territory.

THE SCHOOL QUESTION AGAIN.

From the Iowa Messenger (Catholic).

It is only a question of time, and that short, until the Protestant pulpits will cease protesting against Catholicity, and, with us, join hands in attacking the common enemy of Christianity that is fast decimating the Christian ranks and sowing seeds of Infidelity that future generations will liv to lament. Quite a number of eminent divines and college professors of the denominations hav already awakened to the imminent danger that is ruthlessly threatening the pillars of the Christian household and hav displayed their convictions to the public, in language both plain and strong, that our present free school system is throwing out a class of Atheists, believing in no God, no law, but in their own ambitions, which are sufficiently large to desire the fruits of others' labor without any labor on their part.

Catholicity for years has fought the growing evil of non-religious education, while Protestants generally, we suppose for the sake of opposition to Catholicity, defended the public schools as the bulwark of the state and their form of religion, by which course they were opening up for themselvs an abyss that now endangers their little household of the faith. Catholicity now, as always, appreciating the blessings of religion and foreseeing the effects of the non-religious education of the youth, stepped forward and raised her warning voice that godless schools would manufacture godless citizens, and though a superhuman effort was required, the sacrifice was made and parochial schools were built where obedience to God and secular authority is impressed on the young mind, and where the animal man is taught to be subject to the spiritual.

A long and bitter war has been waged against our church for this act on her part. We hav been declared enemies to the state, enemies to the government, enemies to the bulwark (?) of free institutions. Every rampant preacher, not having a religious topic for Sunday, discoursed on the dangers of Roman Catholicism, and our building schools at our own expense was made the subject of slander and abuse. Not till now hav they seen the errors of their way. We saw the effect in the cause; they only see the effects when produced in the prevalence of Communism and Anarchy that is already deeply rooted in American soil. The Lutherans and Episcopalians were the first to follow the Catholic view; others are now gradually coming in, so that by a unanimous verdict of the Christian denominations the free school system will be pronounced a failure in turning out good citizens or righteous members of society.

The latest body that has adopted our view is the Presbyterian synod, held at Baltimore. It unequivocally pronounced against godless schools and adopted resolutions either to build schools, or attend in some way to the religious training of their youth, who were fast falling away from membership, owing, they said, to the Atheistic influences of godless free schools. Only last week, the Rev. Thomas E. Green, rector of St. Andrew's Episcopal church, in Chicago, expressed himself forcibly on the "mistaken views, the loose morals, and the social disorders of the day" attributable to the public schools. On this account, he harangued his congregation on the necessity of building a parochial school to stem the social disorders that hav already shown their hydra heads iu that city. Mr. Green believes that education in the public schools, with religion strictly excluded, is the source of the "Infidelity and Atheism that flourish in the land, bringing their inevitable fruit of Communism and Anarchy," and that "unless the process of educational secularization shall be stayed, the aspect of the future is black and lowering."

THE POUGHKEEPSIE PLAN EXPLAINED.

From the Milwaukee Sentinel.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SENTINEL: I herewith send you "The Poughkeepsie Plan," as published in the Christian Union, June 17th. In conversing with Father Lalumiere, of St. Gall's Catholic church, a few days since, upon this plan, he expressed an earnest wish to see it. To my own conception it seems the solution, in an admirable manner, of one of the gravest problems of our time. Will you not be good enough to publish it in full, with the opinions accompanying it? I doubt not it will be widely read and aid many minds in arriving at just conclusions upon this important question.

EDWARD D. HOLTON.

The description of the Poughkeepsie plan referred to by Mr. Holton, as given by O. D. M. Baker, president of the Poughkeepsie board of education, is as follows:

"Down to 1873 two parochial schools were maintained in this city under the charge of the Catholic church authorities, in buildings owned by that church. In that year the schools were discontinued, and an arrangement entered into between the owners of the buildings and the board of education whereby the buildings were leased, during school hours, to the city at the nominal rent of $1 per year—the board agreeing to keep the buildings in repair and insured; also to establish and maintain public schools in the buildings, which should be in all respects the same as the schools conducted under the direction of the board in the buildings owned by the city. About September 1st of that year the board received possession of these buildings, under this agreement, and organized public schools of primary grades in them.

"Ten buildings were then being used by the city for school purposes, numbered from 1 to 10, inclusiv; these were numbered, one 11, and the other 12, and they hav since been known by these designations. The organization of these schools by the board was as though no schools had ever been conducted there. Of the twelve teachers then selected but one had been previously employed in the buildings.

"These schools were established, and hav since been conducted, by the board in like manner, and under the same rules as the other public schools of the city, and in all matters of school work, procedure, and disciplin, and in the recognition of absolute and unquestioned control by the civil authorities both of teachers and pupils there has been no distinction between these and the other public schools. From the fact that these schools are situated in the parts of the city where the Catholic population is mainly located, and that the city is not subdivided into districts, but parents are permitted to select any school, of a proper grade, they may desire their children to attend, provided a vacancy exists in the particular room, the pupils in these rooms are largely of Catholic parentage, though more or less pupils of Protestant descent always attend; but no complaint of denominational influence or practice has ever been made to the school authorities. The teachers hav always been examined, employed, and discharged, and all matters concerning these schools acted upon, by the board of its own motion, and without suggestions from or consultation with the owners of the buildings, or any one representing them.

"All the teachers employed in these schools are understood to be of Catholic affiliations, but they hav been selected by the board in the exercise of an untrammeled judgment, the commissioners having deemed it proper to do so. Two of the teachers in one school and three in the other are Sisters of Charity. They are women of high scholastic attainments, and their school work has been very satisfactory; they wear the dress of their society, but are known by their baptismal names, which they use in all communications to the board. The members of this society are ladies of Catholic faith specially educated as teachers and to aid in works of charity; they are not nuns, and differ much from them; the vows of the nun are perpetual, and thereby her life is devoted to the exclusiv service and advancement of the church, while the obligations of the sister are of a temporary character covering but a year, when the member may, at her option, renew them for another year, or honorably and freely retire from membership. Many changes of teachers hav been made by the board, and a majority of those at present employed in these schools hav been educated in the public schools of the city, and are graduates of our high school.

"By the terms of the agreement, the owners hav control of the buildings except during school hours, and I believe catechetical exercises are conducted there with such of the pupils as choose to remain, or who may come there for that purpose from other schools. With this the board, of course, has had nothing to do, except that it has provided that no pupil attending school there shall be restricted in any way in entering or leaving the buildings prior to or after school sessions.

"During the thirteen years of this arrangement the board has consisted of twelve commissioners, selected in annual groups of four, for the term of three years each, by the people of the city at large. No one connected with the Catholic church has been a member of the board or a candidate for a commissionership during this time. But two of the commissioners who were in office in 1872 are now members of the board, and neither of them has since been continuously in office. Prior to the change, the extent and character of instruction in the parochial schools here was not sufficiently advanced to enable those instructed there to enter our high school, and, so far as I hav any knowledge, none ever came to that school from that source; since that time these schools hav been regularly sending pupils to the high school, in about the same proportion as the other schools. This system has apparently been satisfactory to our citizens, and it certainly has been the source of great advantages to a large class of pupils, who hav thereby secured the benefits of a common school education, which otherwise they probably would not hav obtained. I think the arrangement has largely been successful by reason of the very judicious action of the Catholic people here in not attempting to exercise influence, control, or participate in the management of the public schools, and in allowing a Protestant board of education to freely treat and dispose of this serious question. This fact of non-interference has strengthened the board by relieving it from any feeling of insecurity on the part of the Protestant citizens, and enabled it to proceed in such a manner as in the judgment of its members for the time being was best under the circumstances, to so arrange that all children of the city should equally obtain the opportunity to receive the common school education contemplated by law."

The Sentinel has not room for the opinions on this plan published in the Christian Union, but briefly summarizes them. Father Nilan (Catholic), of Poughkeepsie, pronounces it satisfactory. President Bascom, of the Wisconsin state university, is inclined to regard it with favor. The Rev. Howard Crosby, of New York, emphatically opposes it. He says it is virtually the state teaching religion, the sisters who teach during school hours teaching religion to the same pupils afterward. He says that "there is no safety for our country but in a non-religious elementary education in the public schools." President Eliot has a favorable opinion of the plan; so also has Professor Hall, of the Johns Hopkins University. Father McSweeney (Catholic), of New York, and formerly of Poughkeepsie, would favor it if all school boards were like that of Poughkeepsie. If the system were to become general he would insist that Catholic teachers should be provided for children of Catholic parents. The Rev. Geo. S. Payson, of New York, thinks it important that there should be religious instruction in the public schools, but objects to the sectarian dress of the sisters, and suggests that the plan is calculated to encourage sectarian distinctions that should not be recognized by the state. The Rev. A. P. Peabody, of Cambridge, Mass., says the plan seems to him worthy of adoption. Finally, Father T. S. Preston (Catholic), of New York, says, "It is not what Catholics want, for they hav a right to denominational schools, and to their part of the school fund," but that it is "an approach to justice." As such he would tolerate it, with the understanding that the teachers be nominated by the Catholic pastor, and no school books used except such as are approved by the pastor.

THE PLAN IMPERFECT.

From the Catholic Citizen.

The "Poughkeepsie plan" is a device by which Catholics obtain religious instruction for their children through the courtesy of a Protestant school board, and under conditions favorable enough, but liable to be greatly altered by the school board.

As a local makeshift it may answer; but as a method of solving the school question for the country generally, it would prove inadvisable both for the public and the Catholics.

For a permanent settlement, the Catholics would ask something more than the Poughkeepsie plan accords; they would want the arrangement to exist as a guaranty rather than as a courtesy.

Wrangles between state and church would occur in places where the school board was less liberal than the Poughkeepsie board. It would be a repetition of the unhapy state of affairs existing in France and Italy.

If the state and the church wish to become partners in the matter of education, the English and Canadian system is best. If such a partnership cannot exist openly, equally, and legally, sub rosa makeshifts are worse than useless.

The Liberal Club.

It would be a concealment of the truth amounting almost to misrepresentation if the writer of this report should omit to say that he was in unusually good spirits when he started out to attend the 425th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. Many things had conspired to produce this gratifying state of mind. The weather was above criticism, and the store windows, decorated in preparation for the approaching holiday festivities, made walking through the streets a good deal like attending a fair. This may be called cause number one of the salubrious mental frame above alluded to. A clear conscience of course, helped to place the subscriber in a receptiv condition. Furthermore, he had just disposed of his regular winter poem, and had received from the publisher thereof a satisfactory check. It was, therefore, no severe draft upon his finances when the man man with the badge-pin deposited in the hand of Treasurer Morris the consuetudinary five-pence, which is still the regular price of admission to the meetings of the club. And here a word about badge-pins may perhaps be excused. The article which the deponent has hitherto worn was not his own. It was borrowed, abstracted, swiped from the desk of the editor of this paper. It was a plain, every-day, four-dollar pin. On Friday, the 10th, he had placed before him about fifty of Mr. Wettstein's Freethought emblems of all sizes, styles, and values, from two to ten dollars, with directions from the manufacturer to take his choice among them. Not to do injustice to his intelligence, he selected a ten-dollar one. It is of solid gold, eighteen karats or upward, weighs nearly as much as a silver half-dollar, exhibits four colors, and has a diamond in it as big as a capital O of this type. To use a little Latin, it is the ne plus ultra of badge-pins. When the wearer dropped into the only vacant seat among the comfortable and expectant audience at the club, the little diamond threw back the light from the chandeliers in a buisness-like manner, and attracted much attention. He expects to remain happy in the possession of the pin until he shall exchange it for a harp.

Mr. Edward G. Clark was the lecturer of the evening, his subject being the "Basic Law of Ownership." Mr. Clark is an intellectual looking man and a fine reader. He believed he had solved the industrial problem. Aristotle, who saw that property rested on natural wealth, which he called the bounty of nature, was the first political economist. This natural wealth Henry George called the land. It was not made by any man or any stock company, but, to use a theological phrase, was created by God. Therefore man could not own it. This has been denied, but everything is denied by somebody. Natural rights are easy to understand. For instance, men and women are given feet to walk upon, and it would be a subversion of their natural rights to force them to walk on their ears. Those who deny this fundamental proposition are walking with their feet in the air. Mr. Clark affirmed that his solution of the economical question was not a theory, but the discovery of a law. The right to liv implies the right to own. The statement that all men are created equal, rightly understood, is the Golden Rule carried into economics. Moses, the prototype of Henry George, worked merely by the rule of thumb, but his redistribution of wealth every fifty years was an accurate guess. Mr. David Reeves Smith had made the computation that this periodical squaring of accounts was at the rate of two per cent a year, and so an annual tax of two per cent upon all property would effect a complete democracy of wealth. To deny this would be to abolish arithmetic. Henry George's land tax was inconsistent. He would not tax a lump of gold, because labor had been applied to dig and wash it. He would merely tax the hole it came out of. Society makes all values, and there is as much unearned increment about a house as about the ground it stands on. The log is no less the bounty of nature than the tree, yet Henry George would tax the tree and not the log. We can do better than to dig up the mummy of Moses in the nineteenth century, which is practically what the scheme of land nationalization does. As for Socialism, Mr. Clark thought it would produce a government too cumbersome to be of service. Society would resemble one of those old knights of the Middle Ages who could not walk in his armor. Men die at the rate of two per cent a year. By levying an annual tax, therefore, upon all property, each person will hav paid the debt he owes to society by the time when, in the natural course of events, he comes to pay the debt of nature.

The writer would here venture to point out that the above is a pretty slim apology for a report of Mr. Clark's remarkably fine lecture. It is hoped, however, that it is tolerably fair, if not accurate, as far as it goes. This is said as a sort of shield against any missils which Mr. Clark may be pleased to fire at the reporter.

In inviting members of the club to discuss this masterly address in speeches of ten minutes each, the Chair said it trusted that the closeness of thought evinced by the speaker would be imitated by the others. What Mr. Clark had not said or alluded to should escape lengthy criticism. Remarks of a scattering nature would be likely to miss the central thought of the lecture.

Having thus put an extinguisher on those given to overelaborateness of expression, the Chair placidly awaited results. Mr. Henry Appleton, who sat just in front of the writer, endeavored by furtiv demonstrations with his hat to attract attention from the platform, but without success. He is not a member, and only members are accustomed to speak except upon invitation. While Mr. Appleton was still in a state of suspense, Professor Denslow was called for, and went forward.

Mr. Denslow said the Hindoos had a saying that a perfectly wise man would be absolutely silent. He wouldn't hav to ask questions or make propositions, because he would know the answer beforehand. So if the lecturer had been wiser he would hav known the answer to his propositions at the outset, and would not hav made them. The rate of taxation at present in New York is two per cent. The result, therefore, should be what Mr. Clark is anxious to bring about. Professor Denslow admired the skill with which the lecturer had tacked and sailed along peacefully for a distance with Moses, and Karl Marx, and Henry George, and himself (Professor Denslow), and kept his sails full all the time. The lecture would serve as an intellectual amusement—a good way above the minstrels, but it must still remain an amusement and nothing more. Professor Denslow said that he himself was no prophet or believer in prophets, except those spelt with an fi instead of phe. Henry George was a prophet who made a living by prophesying things which never could occur. George's claim that man could not own land because he did not make the land, while the state might own land, reduced itself to a logical absurdity. If man did not make the land, neither did the state make it, and hence could hav no claim to it. The state is only an aggregation of individuals and can hav no rights which those individuals do not possess. The state is bound to be just as good and just as bad as the people are on an average who compose the state. No man can be elected to office who is intellectually above the average citizen except in the ability to say more fluently exactly what the average citizen himself believes. If he differs in opinion from the rest, they won't take him for a poundmaster. Professor Denslow characterized Mr. Clark's theory as too vague and fine-spun to be adopted or even understood by the world at large.

Mrs. Augusta Cooper Bristol, of Vineland, N. J., received from the Chair a very flattering invitation to address the audience. Mrs. Bristol preferred to be considered absolutely wise, and refrained from speaking further than to say that the lecture was to her perfectly plain and practical, and the best she had ever heard on the subject of which it treated.

The lecture was further discussed by Dr. Caleb S. Weeks, Colonel Hinton, and others, and at the usual hour the club adjourned. Next Friday evening, the 17th, Professor Denslow lectures on "The Coming Constitutional Convention."

P. S.—The writer would call attention to the closing paragraph in the editorial article, "Too Deep for Us," in last week's TRUTH SEEKER. He would also venture a correction. The editor does well in referring questions that are too deep for him to the philosophers of the club for solution, but he errs in intimating that those philosophers require but five minutes for that purpose. It is well known that ten minutes are invariably allowed for the solution of any question. Five cents remains the admission fee, whatever else may fall or rise; ladies and Presbyterians free; while Methodists receive a prize. All who attend these meetings feel a pleasure they cannot conceal.

Mr. Reynolds's Program.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The sickness of my wife rendered it necessary that I should accompany her home from New York, instead of devoting myself to the agitation of the repeal of Sunday laws, as I had purposed. Since our arrival home, she has needed all my care and attention. Having myself contracted a severe cold, I hav lacked my usual energy and been unable to reply to correspondents, or to carry on the work of the New York Freethinkers' Association.

But Mrs. Reynolds is gaining now, and I propose to buckle on the armor anew. Under any circumstances, friends may rely on my being fully prepared for trial for the terrible crime of "blasphemy," at Morristown, N. J., the third Tuesday in January.

Of course I look forward to the trial with some anxiety. The orthodox are resolved to convict, if within the scope of possibility. They realize the growing power of Infidelity, and are marshaling all their forces, determined to make vigorous effort to check its progress. If they can imprison the exponent of Freethought; if they can establish a precedent, that the utterance of any words derogatory to or in opposition to Christian faith is unlawful, it will be a great victory for orthodoxy, because they believe it would deter any from giving utterance to Infidel opinions.

As the law stands, I think it quite likely the court will convict. But I can very much better endure the penalty than to make the slightest of our principles or rights; for I am confident the enforcement of the blasphemy laws would insure their speedy repeal in every state in the Union in which they exist.

I would take this opportunity to return my grateful thanks to the friends who hav sent my wife and self letters of cheer and sympathy, and so generously contributed to my defense fund.

Between now and time of trial I shall be glad to fill lecture engagements. My new lecture, "Religious Persecutions of the Nineteenth Century," givs facts that cannot fail to arouse from apathy all who love justice and liberty. Address me, Box 104, North Parma, N. Y. C. B. REYNOLDS.

Political Saints.

The worst scramble for office which has ever occurred in Illinois has just terminated at the state capitol. Several ordained and audacious humbugs hav been fighting for weeks similar to Hudibras's club.

> For they (poor knaves) were glad to cheat
> To get their wives and children meat.

In other words, to do the praying act in the Senate and House for the people of the state of Illinois, in fact, to prefigure

> Church rule in this latter age,
> . . . . . .
> Of hell and heaven to dispose,
> To play with souls at fast and loose.
> . . . . . .
> To set what characters they please,
> And mulcts on sin and godliness;
> To force all people, though against
> Their consciences, to turn saints,
> Must prove a pretty thriving trade
> When saints monopolists are made.
> When pious frauds and holy shifts,
> Get dispensations and gifts.

Two years ago a similar scene of slightly smaller dimensions occurred, and a compromise was finally agreed upon whereby a Democratic Baptist became chaplain of the house, and a Republican Congregationalist of the senate. The candidate of the Preachers' Union—a trade organization of the white-chokered gentry—has generally been accepted, but, owing to the many discordant elements and the bitterness of the fight, they could not agree. A Prohibition Campbellite sought recognition, and was peremptorily sat down on, and a Prohibition Presbyterian sought the high office,

> For Presbyterian pride contests as high
> As doth the popedom for supremacy.

But pride must take a "tumble," and the Knoxite was knocked out. Then several sable brothers entered the wrangle for $90 a month for a few minutes' wind. In fact, everybody had a candidate but the United Labor party. Even

> He of a mongrel, diverse kind
> Cleric before and lay behind,
> A lawless, linsey-woolsey brother,
> Half of one order, half another;
> A creature of amphibious nature,
> On land a beast, a fish in water;
> That always preys on grace or sin,
> A sheep without, a wolf within.

Yes! he was there, and the final wrangle was held last Monday (Dec. 6th), and the newspapers do say—although they will lie—that the proceedings were "far from amicable, and intensely exciting," ending in a little short of a knock-down. The pious participants declined to be interviewed, although one reverend admitted the "fracas" was very unfortunate. Revs. Francis Springer and A. A. Post were the successful spiritual swindlers of the people of the state of Illinois out of $3 per diem. When it can be proved that there ever were or ever will be dividends declared on this investment, we will be willing that prayers shall be substituted for the entire legislature. If God is willing to respond to the request of the preachers, there is no use for a House of Representativs or Senate. Let us abolish either one or the other. I think that the Sandwich Islander has got a labor-saving device in this direction, which some enterprising American ought to improve and patent. I refer to the praying-wheel. It is vastly more economical, and just as reliable. I vote for praying-wheels.

The daily News refers editorially to the affair as follows:

> It is very unfortunate that the clergymen of Springfield should indulge in an unseemly scramble for the two chaplaincies of the legislature. Whatever their motivs may be, their action givs the enemies of the church an opportunity to belicve that $3 a day for a very easily performed service is as great a temptation to a clergyman as to a politician. Better that the office of chaplain should be abolished than that the clergymen should fall to wrangling over it.

MINISTERS' MEETINGS.

Monday our ministers meet regularly to regale each other and the reporters, prior to the reading of the regular paper, with stories not intended for ears polite, chaste, or refined, say some knights of the pencil. When a reporter recognizes a story as "smutty," it must be a vile article indeed, as their vocation is largely with a class who imagin that to be "trooly great" requires their retailing their natural depravity, so that the reporters' sensibilities are somewhat blunted in that direction. When the discussion occurs, they then dispute with as much satisfaction to the reader as Hudibras and Ralph on "ratiocination." Last Monday it took a serious turn. "Pre-millennialism" was the topic of the Methodists. Rev. R. W. Bland boiled over belligerently in a paper opposing this doctrin. The coming of Christ was only espoused by either strong fanatical minds or very weak ones. Though not so dangerous as Liberalism, pre-millennialism is to be deprecated as not in agreement with the scriptures, and tends to bring into contempt our present life. Brother Bland evidently finds "this world" good enough for him, and proposes that Jesus's visit shall be indefinitly postponed so long as good salaries are forthcoming for preaching the gospel of the childlike and Bland.

Brother Blackstone opposed Bland's view with vigor, so we are left to conjecture whether he is strongly fanatical or mentally weak. "The church," he affirmed, "was decaying because of its modern heresy; that post-millennialism was putting the church to sleep and making laughter in hell." What a jolly time they had in hades, for Brothers Bristol, Foster, Miller, and Zimmerman fought against Christ's coming "just now," or any specified time in the future. They seemed a little afraid that Jesus Christ might come in all his glory "to judge the quick and the dead," and spoil their pleasant tea-party with salary attachment, and incontinently demolished Brother Blackstone.

The Baptist preachers are having a conference at the Grand Pacific, and for the the outlay of hundreds of thousands of dollars in property and sky-pilots, they are enabled to report sixteen additional communicants. Cold-water cure stock is at a very low ebb in Chicago.

The rectors of the Deformed Episcopal church held their first weekly meeting last Monday, and did some monumental misrepresentation about their prosperity, when it is a well-known fact they hav had to sell two churches lately.

All the denominations are to confer prior to the week of prayer, presumably to consult and tell "the way Christ went into hell."

THE CHURCH AND K. OF L.

Thirteen members of St. Peter's Lutheran church at Fond du Lac, Wis., were stricken from the rolls because they were members of the K. of. L., and, in spite of church regulations, chose to remain in that order. Good! We shall soon see which side the workingman must take. A Jesuit father in Montreal also preached against the Knights last Sunday. Let the good work go on.

A CREDITABLE ACTION.

The city council of Louisville, Ky., recently voted five hundred bushels of coal to each church society for charities, and the mayor very justly vetoed the measure. If charity is to be dispensed by the city of Louisville, let the city authorities dispense it, not hand it over to the perpetual paupers of the state, the churches. A protest was passed by a meeting of Protestant meetings against the use of public money for church charities. That shows the Catholics were getting the best of the move. But how about public money to pay for the tax on churches?

E. A. STEVENS.

A Reply to Dr. Monroe.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Your reprint from the Ironclad Age of Nov. 27, 1886, in reference to the action of the congress of the American Secular Union is a curious specimen of interested fault-finding. A pig can root up, but it takes a man to build. I do not apply this rude figure personally to the editor of the Ironclad Age, but it is a fact that criticism is an easy thing to do.

Our friend in the cause jumps to the conclusion that London Bridge is broken down, before he knows all the people he is talking about, and who are trying to make the bridge safe.

As I am the holder of the purse, which jingles about $28, I protest against the Ironclad Age's implication that the Truth Seeker Company is building blocks of houses on Fifth Avenue, where some of the corner lots are worth $200,000, out of the funds of the American Secular Union.

Our friend of the cause seems to hav dreamed a dream to the effect that the Truth Seeker Company, like Jonah's whale, swallows up all the cash and all the profits; in fact, has taken the whole fire-place, and the Ironclad Age has no chance to warm its iron toes.

It is an open secret that the treasurer of the American Secular Union is getting $000,000 per year; that he expects by this time next year to be in negotiation (in partnership with the Truth Seeker Company) with the emperor of China to buy the Celestial empire, and if the Ironclad Age will keep still, we will let him in.

It is evident that the editor of the Ironclad Age has nothing to do. Let me ask him to solve these questions: How can the Virgin Mary be the mother of God, or was not God's mother the Virgin Mary? Which was born first? Also, what right has the Rev. Mr. Vinblow Iwillbegood, of Andover, to make a half-way hell for savages, when the thing is patented by the old house of Pecci & Co., of Rome.

But if the Ironclad Age insists that the smart fellows of the Truth Seeker Company are getting all the money in the West, through the American Secular Union, I shall stand firm and deny it, and shake the demnition total of $28 in his face, and, like Macbeth's daggers, will be ever before his eyes.

New York. CHARLES ECKHARD,
Treas. Am. Secular Union.

Lecture Appointments by Samuel P. Putnam.

The secretary of the American Secular Union will begin his annual lecture tour in January next. January 5th and 6th he will lecture at Martinsburg, W. Va.; Jan. 9th, at Pittsburgh, Pa.; Jan. 10th and 11th, at Alliance, O.; Jan. 12th, 13th, and 14th, at Kent, O.; Jan. 16th, at Columbus, O.; Jan. 18th, 19th, and 20th, at Cincinnati, O.; Jan. 29th and 30th at Chicago, Ill.; Feb. 1st and 2d at Nekoma, Ill.; Feb. 5th and 6th at Fort Madison, Iowa; Feb. 13th, at Ba[illegible]ia, Kan.; and Feb. 20th, at Fort Dodge, Kan.; and from thence the secretary will proceed to the Pacific states and territories. The route beyond Fort Dodge is not yet fully determined, as it depends to some extent upon the lecture engagements to be hereafter made. Will not all Liberals who are interested in the work of the Secular Union please take note of the lecture appointments now published and, as the dates are not yet completely filled, make arrangements for the use of all the extra nights, so that the line of travel can be made available without any added expense? Many places hav to be omitted because the railroad fares and hotel bills are greater than what friends can raise for expenses. If, however, points can be made along the route announced, so that the extra outlay is but little, lectures can be given and resources economically used. From Fort Dodge, Kan., the secretary has under consideration the plan of going to the Pacific slope by the Southern route, and he desires to enter at once into communication with all Liberals along that route, so that every available place can be visited and lectures given in New Mexico, Arizona, and southern California.

The object of this lecture trip is to make acquaintance with the Liberals of the country, in order that by understanding the general mind the best plans can be made for national effort. Experience has demonstrated that we cannot hav a congress of Liberals that shall be an entirely representativ assembly on account of the vastness of the country. The only way to find ample expression of the Liberal party is by a lecture tour and newspaper correspondence, by the personal activity and presence of the secretary himself in all the places where there is a company of Liberals. If this plan is carried out, Freethought organization becomes a power. If it is not, then fraternal association on the broad basis of national life is impracticable. So it is hoped that the friends of progress who believe in the union of our forces will make available the lecture trip of the secretary for the coming year, not simply for the enlightenment of the general public, but for the cultivation of the noble spirit of comradeship.

Address all communications until Jan. 1st to Samuel P. Putnam, 76 East 11th St., New York. After Jan. 1st, address care of E. A. Stevens, chairman of Finance Committee, 750 W. Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM,
Sec. American Sec. Union.

New York, Dec. 12, 1886.

A Plea for Roxanna Druse.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS (of New York state): I am terribly anxious that every one of you should do something to avert the hanging of Mrs. Druse now in jail in Herkimer county for the murder of her husband.

She is sentenced to be hung Dec. 29, 1886—only a short time to work in, but much may yet be done if you so will it. The poor woman was crazed by the brutal treatment of her "lord and master" through a long series of years, till at last poor human nature could no longer stand it, and she took vengeance in her own hands. But does this make it right that the law should brutally murder her? Man-made laws crush out the womanhood of the weak and feeble, and then hang them for not "turning the other cheek" also. Friends, send to E. W. Chamberlain, 120 Broadway, New York, at once, and get petitions, and then obtain all the signatures possible and forward them ere too late.

No one can do a better work than this. Our civilization is far behind the age when it allows a weak, demented, terror-stricken woman to be hung for what she was driven to do in sheer desperation.

The Earthquake and the Deity.

From the Milwaukee Sentinel.

If the president's assumption that Charleston was shaken up, its buildings shattered, and many of its people killed and wounded by a direct intentional act of the deity, it would seem like questioning the propriety of the whole transaction to sympathize with the sufferers. The more natural conclusion of a devout mind would be that they deserved what they got. The theories of the scientists, which regard the earthquake at Charleston as due solely to some peculiar formation of the earth's strata at that point, warrant us in extending earnest sympathy and practical kindness to the people of that city, but such sentiments are illogical and sacrilegious if the president's view of the case is the correct one.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE lectures Sunday evenings in Denver, Col., by W. F. Jamieson, hav been crowned with great success. The Secular Union there is in dead earnest. Long before the hour of meeting the walks in front of Unity church were filled with people. By some oversight the building was not opened until 7:55, when it was filled to overflowing, and hundreds turned away unable to gain entrance. The speaker announced that he would continue the subject under the head of "Thomas Paine's Political and Military Career," on the following Sunday evening. This appeared in the Denver Tribune-Republican next morning: "There is now a movement by the Secularists to retain Mr. Jamieson's services as speaker and worker for six months, and to build a Secular hall costing from $20,000 to $25,000." The Tabor Opera House would hav been engaged, but the manager, after Putnam's lectures there, raised the rent to $100 an evening, but let the Christians hav it for less than $50. Jamieson is lecturing week evenings in adjoining towns, Greeley, Longmont, Canyon City, and may giv a course at Boulder. He will, however, soon devote all his time to Denver, with the exception of one or two evenings each week. Address, Denver, Col.

J. E. REMSBURG lectured in Buffalo, November 30th. This is the first Liberal meeting held in Buffalo for several years. The Buffalo Courier thus refers to it: "John E. Remsburg, the noted Freethought orator, spoke at the Germania Theater last evening on 'Sabbath-Breaking.' Mr. Remsburg is a dark-complexioned, good-featured man of about forty-five [thirty-eight] years, and is possessed of a good voice and easy delivery. His lecture may be summed up in these words: Sunday cannot be a holy day; let us make of it a holiday. Let us take it away from the priests and giv it to the people. He said there was no authority for the Christian Sabbath either in the Bible or outside of it. If there was any Sabbath it must be the seventh day of the week. He offered to giv any person $100 for a single text from the Bible authorizing the first day of the week, or Sunday. The Sunday Sabbath was simply an old pagan idea adopted by the church in the fourth century. He quoted from Luther, Melancthon, Calvin, Grotius, Milton, Jeremy Taylor, Archbishop Cranmer, Bishop Warburton, Archbishop Whately, Archbishop Paley, and other eminent Christian authorities, to show that there was no authority for the observance of Sunday as a Sabbath."

"THE Semi-annual State Convention of Liberalists and Spiritualists met at Ionia, Mich., Nov. 20th and 21st. The weather was favorable, and representativs from Greenville, Belding, Lyons, Saranac, and other places were present, and a general good time was the result. The meeting was opened by Mr. J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw. He gave us an excellent discourse on the much-needed subject 'Charity,' which was highly appreciated by all, and we trust that the good seed fell on fallow ground. He was followed by Mrs. Warner Bishop, of Cedar Grove, Wis., an earnest, wide-awake, practical worker in the Spiritual field. Music also lent its charm at each session. Dr. Ira Davenport, father of the Davenport boys, the noted physical mediums, was also with us. He and Dr. Moore, of Flint, hav been, and are yet, performing Christ's mission of healing the sick in our vicinity with great success. A Mrs. Davidson, a test-medium from Munroe, was here also. We had three sessions on Sunday which were well attended. Sunday evening, after an able discourse from Mr. Burnham, the meeting was closed by Mrs. Bishop with words of hope and many good wishes. She also spoke words of consolation to a lonely pair, whose all had gone before. As she saw their children by their side, she accurately described them, and gave to their bereaved parents words of cheer from their dear ones, which were cordially and thankfully received."—COR. STRUCK DEAD WHILE BLASPHEMING.

From the World.

LOUISVILLE, Dec. 4, 1886.—Superstitious colored people here are much excited over the sudden death of Dr. John A. Brown, colored. The story goes that he was an avowed Atheist; that several evenings ago he accompanied two colored women who were returning from church to their home; that while there he interrupted a religious controversy by declaring there was no God, and while in the midst of a blasphemous tirade fell dead. The awe-struck bystanders thought this death was sent in punishment for his blasphemy, and, as no one would prepare the remains for burial, the city undertaker next day buried the body in Potter's Field, no relativs applying for the corpse.

DIED ON HER KNEES IN CHURCH.

From the Sun.

NEW YORK, Dec. 3, 1886.—An old woman who had been kneeling in the vestibule of St. Francis Xavier's church in West Sixteenth street yesterday afternoon suddenly burst out into loud screams. The priests who were busy in the confessionals went out to the woman. She had fallen forward on her face and was dead. The body was removed to the Thirtieth street police station. A young man identified the woman as his mother, Maria McKenzie, of 246 West Twentieth street. She was sixty years old and afflicted with heart disease.

"THE Story Hour" is a jewel, and should be kept in every household, whether there are children there or not.—B. F. Crasdell.

Communications.

The Religious Experience of Benjamin Stackpole.

When I was in Maine last fall an uncle of mine who livs there said to me one day: "Boy, I hav a story that I'll giv you for THE TRUTH SEEKER, if you wish, only you must print it just as I tell it. If you fix it up you might spoil it." I promised to make a faithful transcript, and here is the story he told:

As long ago as when I was a boy there used to be an old skid lived down the river in Thomaston, Knox county, by the name of Ben Stackpole. He never connected himself with any of the regular religious societies, because they wouldn't hav him around, but if there was a meeting going on, old Ben was there. Dumdest coward, he was, too, you ever see. They used to tell this yarn on Ben, before he moved down to Thomaston, so you can guess about what kind of an old hypocrit he was.

Bears were pretty frequent up on the hill in them days, where Ben's pasture was when he lived up-river, and he generally took a gun with him when he went after the cows—an old double-barreled shot-gun he had that wouldn't hit nothin' 'twas pointed at. Just on the heith of land there was a little clearing—woods on all sides, of course—and Ben's cows ordinarily went there to feed about the time he wanted 'em most. One day there was a party of fellows went into the woods hunting over back of the hill, and after beating around all day, about sundown they rowsed out a thundering big bear—one of them old settlers that has a strip of white down the middle of the face. Well, of course, the bear run. Old Ben was just coming after his cows, and when he struck into the clearing on one side the bear jumped out of the woods on t'other, and come towards where Ben was hellertyhoot. Ben didn't see the bear and the bear didn't see Ben till they was within a few rods of one another, and then the first thing Ben did was to up with his gun and let drive at the critter. Then the bear turned tail and run one way and Ben turned tail and run t'other. Ben hadn't more'n got back to the edge of the woods before he stepped in a hole all of a sudden and down he flopped, and 'tother barrel of his gun went off ker-bang. At the same time the bear met one of the hunters coming out of the woods 'tother side the clearing, and the fellow put a ball into him and over he flopped. Then the fellow started towards Ben. The old fool heard him coming. He hadn't heard t'other fellow's gun on account of his own going off simultaneous next to his ear, and he made up his mind the bear was onto him. Scairt? Well, I guess he was scairt. He dasn't move, and so what does he do, by thunder, but set in and pray for Christ's sake. The fellow that had shot the bear stood and harked to him. In the course of his prayer old Ben giv in to having been a mean cuss all his life. He had cheated the widder and orphan, was the biggest liar between the two rivers, and had hauled green oats into town and sold 'em for old oats, and I don't know what all; but what he was sot on was that he didn't deserve to be chewed by a bear, and he wound up by saying, "Lord," says he, "if you can't see your way clear to help me in this fight, don't for Christ's sake help the bear!"

When Ben got to this place he slewed his eye around to see what had become of Bruin, and there stood the hunter laughing at him, and the bear laid all in a heap t'other side the clearing. Well, sir, now you better believe he felt cheap. He picked up his old gun, hunted up his cows, and went home. After that if you wanted to see Ben Stackpole tearing mad you didn't need to kick him. All you had to do was to say bear.

Well, this experience of coming so close to death, as he'd supposed, set old Ben to thinking that perhaps he ought to be laying in some religious supplies against similar accidents. 'Twan't long after he moved to Thomaston before there was what they call union meetings there; and of course he went, letting on to be piouser'n hell. Set there and roll his eyes up, the old cuss would, and beller glory to God as if he was the religiousest man in the state. Same time, as he said in his prayer when he thought the bear was going to get him, he was the biggest liar between the Penobscot and Kennebec. Couldn't believe nothing he told you, no more'n's if he hadn't said it at all.

Well, the union meetings was being conducted by three old sky-pilots that bossed the gospel camps there in Thomaston. They'd doubled teams and was hauling sinners out of the woods of perdition with a rolling hitch. One of them was the Reverunt Mr. Bugles—he was Cong'gational. Then there was Elder Spiggins, a Methodist, and Brother Birtwhistle, a Hardshell Baptist swamper.

These fellows all laid Ben out as a promising convert and a swelling, bud that would bloom into a saint in the nigh future. They prayed with him, he a groaning and saying Amen, till finally they thought 'twas about time for Brother Stackpole, by golly, to come forward and giv himself out as a convert. So one night they all three at him to once. Ben he hung off that time, but giv 'em to understand that the coming evening he would hand in his testimony. Next night come, and Ben was there, and sot in his seat looking solemner'n a dam'd owl. The ministers thought they had him, and didn't pay much attention to him the first part of the evening. Well, the meeting run along. Some got up and testified, and some got down and prayed, but Ben never stirred. The Reverunt Mr. Bugles lay to and preached, Elder Spiggins exhorted, and Brother Birtwhistle sung psalms till their pipes was ready to bust, all on 'em; but Ben sot still and looked solemner than ever. Finally Elder Spiggins goes over to him and says:

"Brother Stackpole, shan't we hear from you this evenin'?" Then Ben says:

"No," says he, "I guess not. I've had a set-back, Elder Spiggins, that I can't get over."

"Is that the cause of your lookin' so ser'us?" says Elder Spiggins, and Ben says:

"Yes, it is. I'm shaked in my mind."

"Ah, my friend," the elder answers him, "that's where the blessin's of the gospel truth take holt. Unbosom yerself, Brother Stackpole, and light will break in onto your troubled sole."

"Oh, it ain't about myself that I am ser'us," Ben tells him. "It's about you an' Brother Birtwhistle an' the Reverunt Mr. Bugles. It was revealed to me in a dream, the same as if I was a Daniel come to judgment. I've had a vision." Then he groaned again.

Of course they all wanted to know what it was that Ben had dremp, so he gets onto his feet and givs them this yarn:

"It was arter I went home from the meetin' here last night," he says, "that I had the dream I'm goin' ter tell ye about. I dremp that I was dead, and havin' crossed the river by the ferry I started off to'ards the heavenly gates. Old Peter, as I took him to be, stood at the door like a ticket taker to a circus. I didn't know how I was goin' to be received, so I hung back an' camped down under a tree where I could see the others as they come strollin' along. The new arrivals was frekent. Some was let in after they'd qualified, an' others was dropped inter a slide an' scooted off out of sight. These last was the unbelievers. I laid under the tree some time, an' nobody come that I was acquainted with, till finally a man hove in sight that I thought I reck'nized. When he got closter I see sure 'nough it was the Reverunt Mr. Bugles. He marched along with his head up, big as tophet, an' was goin' right in, sayin' nothin' ter nobody. Old Pete he hailed him an' says:

"'Look here, neighbor, whar ye boun' fer?'

"The Reverunt Mr. Bugles never turned his head more'n long 'nough ter remark that he was boun' fer the kingdom, an' kept right on. Then Pete stops him an' asts:

"'You're the Reverunt Mr. Bugles, ain't ye?'

"'Yes,' ansers the parson, 'I guess I be.'

"'Cong'gational?' inquires Peter.

"'That was my sex, I'm flattered ter say,' the parson ansers him.

"'The feller that helped k'nduct the revival in Thomaston, Knox county, ain't ye?' was Pety's next interrogat'ry.

"'The eyedenticle same, sir,' and Bugles was goin' ter pass on.

"'Stiddy, my cherub,' says Pete, 'we don't 'low no Cong'gational preachers in the kingdom. We let one of 'em in once an' 'twan't twenty-four hours 'fore he wanted the Almighty ter resyne an' let him boss the whole camp. There's a pen over there jest outside the fence where you can turn in. You'll find it ockerpied by several of yer disting'ished preedecessers.'

"So the Reverunt Mr. Bugles was marched off by a lad they called Mikle, an' didn't git ter heaven arter all.

"I kept shady under the tree," continues Ben. "Thinks I, if Parson Bugles can't enter the gates, the chances of my gittin' thar are pretty scatterin'.

"Well, 'twas a long time ag'in 'fore any one else that I know'd arriv, but arter a while away out yender I heerd some one singin':

"'In ther good ole way—in ther good ole way—
We're goin home in the good ole way—wow!'

"Right off then I know'd Elder Spiggins was comin'. Peter he slid his thumbs up over his shoulders under his galluses, an' says, 'Nuther minister o' the gospil.' When the elder got nigh whar I was he happened ter see a good-lookin' female angel standin' on the wall with her hair an' close blowin' 'bout in the zeffirs, an' he stops his singin' quicker'n litenin' an' sets in an' tries ter paralyze it. Says Peter, 'If that ain't a Methodist, I'm a Dutchman.' Well, he puts Elder Spiggins through the same course o' katekizin' he'd sprung on Bugles, an' then tells him:

"'I'm sorry for ye, elder, but ye can't go in. The last Methodist sky-pilot we admitted twitted the Saviur o' not bein' the son o' his mother's husbun', an' more'n that, he begun ter purr 'roun' the Virgin Mary in a compromisin' way. Ye see that pen over thar. Them's your quarters. Tra la. Git!' An' that's the last I see o' Elder Spiggins.

"Well," went on Ben, snuffling, "when I see how the parsons was bein' handled, I felt shakyer'n ever. I thought o' makin' a sneak, but the clearin' aroun' didn't look very promisin', so I waited. An' who d'ye think the next disting'ished arrival was? Nevertheless than Brother Birtwhistle, ye-whoopee. Says I to myself, 'He'll go through sure,' bein' he was a humble man, and let the wimmin' folks alone fur all I know. Soon's Brother Birtwhistle gits inside o' hailin' distance Peter sings out to him:

"'Hullo, ole webfoot, whar you goin'?'

"Brother Birtwhistle looks a little rattled, but he says, meeker'n' Moses:

"'My frien', did you 'lude ter me as webfoot?'

"'Well, why not?' arkes Peter. 'Look ter yer huffs.'

"Brother Birtwhistle looks down, an' I looks too, an' there he was, webfooted as a duck, by hokey.

"'Baptis's is allus that way when they git here,' Peter explains. 'You see that tank 'o water yender, Brother Birtwhistle. Go paddle.'"

Here old Ben held up long enough to blow his nose, and then made another rise:

"'Bout this time things was lookin' pretty streaked fer me, but 'twas nigh closin' up time, an' I had ter make a move. So I ups to St. Pety, an' givs him a bow, an' says.

"'Good-evenin'.' He passes the time o' day an' keeps mum.

"'Pleasant weather,' I venchers to obsurve, ''ceptin' it looks a little ketchin' over thar,' says I, pointin' torst some thunderin' black clouds.

"'Smoke from tophet,' Peter grunts. Then I called to mind the passage in the scriptur' book that says, 'The smoke o' ther torment assendeth up'ard f'rever'n ever,' an' I tell ye, bretherin, it giv me a big jump.

"'Hope that ain't ter be my portion,' I sudjests, sorter feelin my way along.

"'I dunno,' says Peter, 'who be ye?'

"Then I straitens up an' givs it out that I was Benjamin Stackpole, of Thomaston, Maine, United States of Ameriky.

"'H'm, Maine—Neal Dow—Prohibition—humbug!' he snorts. 'You must of drinked a good deal o' bad likker in your day, Mr. Stackpole.'

"I replies that I has ter my sorrer. Next question was:

"'What church d'ye belong ter.' He had me there by the umbilikle. I told him I never k'nected myself with any church, an' was goin' on ter say that I had led a decent life, an' had never said nothin' disrespectable to'ard religion, when he stops me an' says:

"'That's enough. Mr. Stackpole, the broad fields o' heaven is open to you!'

"Now, bretherin, I was as much sprised as you'd 'a ben to hear him say that, but I keeps on an even keel and says:

"'Yer reverents, may I ast a question?'

"'Certingly.'

"'Well,' says I, 'does all the ministers that comes here be put in them 'ere little pens?'

"'Yes,' ansers Peter.

"'An' don't they git crowded,' I asts.

"'No,' says he, 'after they've spent a few days together they're so dum'd sick o' one another's comp'ny that they requests permission ter go ter hell a little while fer a change; and when they git thar they find the s'ciety good 'nough so that they never wants ter come back.'

"Right here, bretherin," says Ben preparing to sit down, "I woke, an' that was an end on't."

That's the story old Ben Stackpole told at the union meeting in Thomaston. I don't suppose he ever had any such dream in his life. As I said, he was the biggest liar between the Penobscot and Kennebec.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

W. S. Bell in Texas.

Texas is a great state—great in geographical extent as well as in her spirit of enterprise. It is quite impossible to form anything like a correct estimate of this grand country without seeing something of it. I hav had a pretty fair chance to see the state and to become acquainted with the spirit of the people; and I can assure our Liberal friends at the North that waving the bloody shirt in political campaigns is nothing more than a scarecrow. The people of the South are reconciled to the situation. In all my acquaintance with Southern people, I found only one man who was still fighting the war over again. Besides, they are not without just grounds of complaint in the enfranchisment of the negro. My Liberal friends here, people formerly from the North, assure me that the vilest men can go to the polls on election day, and buy or bribe the negro voter with a few drinks of whisky. Reason, morality, and patriotism hav no perceptible influence upon them. This, of course, vexes the white people who want good officers and good laws.

October 28th, I reached Fort Worth, and was kindly entertained by Mr. F. W. Bradley, proprietor of the Windsor Hotel.

There are not many outspoken Liberals here, although there are quite a number of the soft-shell kind. I had the pleasure of aiding in organizing a Secular Union. Mr. F. W. Bradley was elected president, and I hope under his guidance a strong union will be established.

From Fort Worth I went to Terrell, and was a day behind time, but this proved to be all the better, as there was a grand entertainment of some kind the night before. The man who has done the work for this community is Mr. T. C. Glass. He is a genuin all-round Liberal. Just now Mr. Glass has aid and comfort from a minister who coöperated with me in getting out an audience to hear me. Besides, he introduced me to the people in generous and complimentary terms. This gentleman's name is Rev. N. Schultz, Unitarian evangelist, self-appointed and, to a large degree, self-sustained. Mr. Schultz is doing a good work here, and I am greatly in sympathy with him; but as I looked at him occasionally while I was opening the eyes of the blind, I could not resist the thought suggested in the old saying, "A strange cat in the wrong garret." But he will get out of the wrong garret and get into the right one. I know how it is myself. I hav been there. The lecture was on liberty and morality, and was well received.

From Terrell the pilgrim went to Corsicana. Arrangements had not been completed for my address, and I was delayed several days. Mr. E. H. Church secured the Opera House, and by advertising we secured a fair-sized audience. Col. Nat. Pinkston, formerly of Corsicana, but now of Hubbard City, came to hear me. The colonel is a veteran in the cause.

During the lecture an orthodox lady who by some means or other had got into the wrong garret, turned around in her seat and said to Mrs. Church that the best thing to be done with such a man would be to rottten-egg him out of town.

But Mrs. Church, being a noble Liberal, replied that that was all that orthodox people could do, when they could not answer the truths and arguments of Liberals. The orthodox lady looked tired, and subsided.

My next stopping-place was Kerens. I reached there in the afternoon, and found the whole town given up to the election. A few hand-bills were circulated among the crowds upon the street, and that night I had the pleasure of speaking to a large audience. Judge M. Melear is the pilot in the cause of mental freedom here. He is an outspoken Freethinker, and has great influence in the community.

From Kerens I went to Athens, only a few miles away. I had no engagement at that place, but I knew of one man there who was a host of himself, T. P. Vaughn. He has voiced the sentiments of liberty in season and out of season and often at great personal sacrifice. I had the pleasure of sharing his and his family's hospitality, his wife and her sister being true blue, and all the daughters, young girls in their teens and going to school, are chips off the old block. The youngest is named Tommie Paine Vaughn. "What an odd name for a girl!" say the children. "What a horrid name!" say their pious parents. But Tommie rejoices in her name, and wears it proudly as a jewel.

For many years Dr. Collins has being doing grand work here in distributing Freethought literature to all who would read, and also reasoning with them mightily out of the bible of nature. The doctor is a well-informed man, and has done valiant service. I hope I may hav the pleasure of seeing him again if I should go to Texas on another lecture trip, as I hope to do in two years. My next point was quite a long distance away towards the southern limits of the state, at Handley's Store, ten miles away from everywhere. Moscow was the nearest railroad approach. We were here kindly entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Daughtry, and made the acquaintance of Dr. Daughtry, a pronounced Liberal. It was in this town that the orthodox tried to sit down on Brother Remsburg, and he objected so seriously that they had to pass.

Mr. John A. Handley came to Moscow as soon as he learned that I had reached the land of the Philistines, and took me home with him. The trip was very pleasant, as the weather was delightful. On Sunday morning there was a "dipping" by the Baptist brethren down in the creek. It is true it was not much of an affair, as there was only one sister put down under the water; and as she made no fuss over it, never opened her mouth to say how she took it, except to throw out a little of the creek water that she had unadvisedly taken in, it was a very tame business. And while the minister and friends were helping her to the horse-blanket tent but recently extemporized for the occasion, in which the sister might take off her diving clothes, we turned about and came home.

The Baptist minister had expressed a desire to hear me speak, and said that if I would giv my lecture shortly after he had got through with his morning service he would stay to hear me. Of course I was only to happy to comply.

He sat before me and bore up bravely under my ungodly talk. I had not only the shepherd, but I had also the flock before, and I made a special effort not to shock them, although I am sure I did, for what I considered exceedingly mild some of them looked upon as horrid and blasphemous. I very resolutely set myself to instruct the people rather than to offend or "bullyrag" them. I commenced by telling them my Christian experience, and how I was led to doubt and to go on doubting and inquiring after truth. I showed them where some of the old myths came from. I took them up to the old nests of tradition and we took out the eggs and handled them.

I think my lecture will do some good in that community.

On Monday night I spoke again, but I cannot begin to describe the weird scenes incident to the occasion. In the first place, one needs to see these tall old trees to appreciate their grandeur. The pine forests are simply magnificent. Each tree is a giant, rising over a hundred feet high, and standing so close one to another as to make a somber forest at noonday. There is no underbrush, but a smooth carpet of leaves or short velvety grass, over which the hunter may ride at full speed without danger to either horse or rider. But as the deer are scarce, this breakneck speed is not often seen in these parts. Now, if the forests are somber in daytime, what must they be at night? In the evening we walked through these silent and sublime forests to the little church a mile and a half away. What a deep feeling pervades one's whole being as he walks in such a communion with nature. Oh, the grand old trees! how they looked down upon us that night as we went by them and their nativ cathedral into the little conventional church. How small we seemed in the presence of these primeval giants! Perhaps it was the inspiration of these ancients that enabled me to ring out the old and to ring in the new more effectivly than usual, for I certainly never felt in better mood than I did that night. Long shall I remember the little church without doors or windows, lighted up with a few candles, and the grand old overtopping pines looking down upon us, with their crowns of over a century's existence.

W. S. Bell.

The Despotism of Methodism.

From an article in the Forum.

In casting about for a model after which to organize his "societies," and in formulating a creed and rules for their life and government, Mr. Wesley seems to hav borrowed some things from the Puritans, others from the Church of England, and others still from the Jesuits. In their severe simplicity of dress and manners, and deep seriousness of life, the early Methodists remind us of the Puritans in the time of Cromwell; and the Wesleyans—the Methodists of England—are not wholly unlike the other Dissenters in their form of government, having no bishops, as has the Methodist church in the United States, but electing, at each session of their conference, a president. The "Articles of Religion," prepared by Mr. Wesley for the church in America, are an abridged form of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. The vows of obedience to superiors in authority, required of candidates for ordination to the offices of deacons and elders, remind one of the vows of obedience imposed by Ignatius Loyola. The candidate for ordination in the Methodist church promises to "act in all things, not according to his own will, but as a son in the gospel," to "employ his time as we"—the church, or his superiors—"direct," and to "do that part of the work which we advise." He has to promis the bishop that he will "reverently obey the chief ministers unto whom is committed the charge and government over him," and will "follow with a glad mind and will their godly admonitions, and submit to their judgments." He must not only agree to giv up his own will and judgment, and implicitly to obey another, but he must be "glad" to do it! The Jesuits could hardly ask more.

One of the anomalies of Methodism is that, while Mr. Wesley gave his followers in England a free form of government, without bishop or presiding elders, the Methodist Episcopal church of this country has both these officers, and is from first to last despotic in form, if not in spirit, from the lowest to the highest places of power. The preacher in charge appoints the "leaders" of the "classes;" he also nominates the "stewards;" thus, he virtually creates the "Quarterly Conference." Then the bishops appoint the presiding elders of the annual conferences, who hav charge of the "districts," and constitute the bishop's "cabinet." In all this there is nothing electiv, or, in a republican sense, representativ.

The annual conferences elect delegates to the General Conference; and the presiding elders, from their positions as "superiors in office," so far control, or at least influence, the votes of those under their charge, as to secure the election of a sufficient number of their order to hav a majority in the General Conference. This is the highest and the only law-making power in the church; and it elects the bishops, the book agents, the editors of the different church papers, and the officers of the missionary and other societies. The result is that everything tends to create a self-appointing and self-perpetuating class of superiors, or church dignitaries, with the further necessary result of a long line of subordinates and dependants upon their will. In politics, we would call this a "ring;" in government, we would call it anything but republican. These church officials naturally come to love authority, and in a large sense to feel that they own the church; that the hard-working preachers are controled by and working for them; and that the people hav only to pay the bills.

Not in Romanism itself, nor in the government of an army, is there a more thorough organization or a more perfect equipment, with all the essentials for a strict surveillance over every individual and every department, and with power to enforce its rules, than is found in the Methodist church of America. Fortunately for the church and the cause of religion, the bishops hav generally been conscientious men, and hav sought to use their great power for good; and in a less degree the same may be said of other high officials; but the vast machinery for injustice and oppression exists, and more than once hav good men felt its crushing weight.

For some unaccountable cause, it seems to be the natural tendency of all organizations, both political and religious, as they increase in numbers and power and wealth, to depart from the original simplicity and purity of purpose, and singleness of aim, that at first called them into existence. The monastic orders of the Catholic church were at first singularly pure and devoted, but with the increase of wealth and power they became corrupt. Cromwell began by opposing a royal despot, and ended by becoming himself a military dictator, though he used his vast power for the good of the nation. And Methodism, that began as a revival—a spiritual impulse, a heart-power—is steadily and rapidly tending to a vast ecclesiasticism, with ambitions for wealth and world-wide power. Its original puritanic simplicity of dress is a thing of the past. The rule forbidding "the putting on of gold and costly apparel" still stands in the Disciplin; it is one of the "general rules," that cannot be changed, and the preachers are required to read these rules to the church once every "quarter," or four times a year, in every charge. But no one seems to regard the reading of the rules as anything more than a matter of form. Certainly, no one seems in the least disturbed by the rule concerning dress; and yet nearly every one who hears the rule read knows that he is violating it every day, and especially on Sundays; for the Methodists, more, perhaps, than any other people, seem to take a pride in showing their fine clothes on the Lord's day. Even the preachers who stand up and read the rule that forbids "the putting on of gold and costly apparel," carry gold watches and chains, and "put on" the most "costly" broadcloths, and wear "gold" buttons and studs in their shirts. The time was, and that within the present century, when a woman or a young girl, wearing a simple ruffle, or a flower upon her bosom or on her bonnet, was not permitted to enter a "love-feast" or "class meeting."

In its doctrinal position, the Methodist church is peculiar. Luther sought in his day to reform the doctrins of the church. Wesley sought to reform the hearts and lives of the people. And it is a singular fact that the great vital and spiritual truths of the early Methodists, such as the "Witness of the Spirit," and "Holiness," are not even mentioned in the "Articles of Religion." Mr. Wesley prepared for the Methodist church in America an abridged form of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, with such corrections as he thought proper. These are so a part of the organic law of the church that they can never be changed. Thus this one good man, more than a hundred years ago, settled at once and forever the creed of the Methodist church; and now it is required of every member coming into the church to say that he believes it. No matter what greater light may come to the world, or what larger faith, these twenty-five "Articles of Religion" must stand and be accepted just as they are. It is well known to scholars that one of these articles, the fifth, asserts an historical error in affirming that of the authority of all the canonical book of the Old and New Testament there "was never any doubt in the church;" but the error can never be corrected.

It is a striking fact also that these "Articles of Religion," like the Apostles' and the Nicene Creeds, contain not one word about endless punishment. These ancient creeds do affirm the doctrin of everlasting life, but not of everlasting death. Until a few years ago the "Articles of Religion" were the only standard by which a Methodist minister could be tried for heresy. He could be tried only for teachings contrary to the "Articles of Religion;" and then, to meet the case more fully, the general conference added, "or standard authorities." But it did not specify what these "standard authorities" are; and hence preachers may be tried and expelled under a law that is indeterminate in itself, but determinable by a church jury or committee. I confess that I do not like this; but the difficulty of defining the "standards" is so great that the church hardly dare attempt it, for the "authorities" do not in all things agree one with the other.

Wesley would be called an "authority," and, as such, might be quoted in support of endless punishment; but who now believes in his doctrin of a material hell-fire? And yet, if Wesley be an "authority," why accept his teachings as to the endlessness of hell-torments, but reject the material "fire and brimstone?"

SPECIAL NOTICE.

There are about a thousand of our subscribers in arrears, their indebtedness aggregating some two or three thousand dollars. To each one of these debtors, of course, the amount is small, but to us the amount is very large, and sadly hinders our work. We need this money—need it now—and we respectfully ask that it be remitted.

It costs a great deal of money to publish a large journal, and we hav no extensiv advertising patronage to help us out. We depend entirely upon the subscription list and book sales to obtain cash to pay bills, and when so large a sum as two and three thousand dollars is kept from us, the financial shoe grows painfully tight.

Every subscriber can see upon his tab just to what date his subscription is paid. Those whose time has expired are requested to remit at once.

A Children's Book by Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

We hav in press, to be issued in a few days, a new book for children by Mrs. E. D. Slenker. Nothing, we think, need be said of the ability and popularity of the author. She is known to almost every Freethinker in the country, and no writer is better liked. For a year or two she has been writing more especially for children, and this new book will be gladly welcomed by the little ones. It is entitled, "Little Lessons for Little Folks." Each chapter is a lesson about something which the children see every day, and about which their curiosity is excited. A copy of this book presented to every child that can read will save parents an endless amount of questioning, and at the same time impart more detailed and accurate information than the majority of parents can giv their youngsters off-hand.

The chapters are: Stars; Monkeys; Items about Fishes; Fresh Air; Matter and Life; Life and Her Children; Books; Clover; Water; Stones; Animals and Vegetables; Little Leaves; The Nerves; On the Sense of Smell; Heredity and Natural Selection; The Camel; The Frog; The Cow; Dolls; Grass.

The book is handsomely printed in large type, and bound in boards, with illuminated covers. The price is 40 cents, postpaid by mail.

One Honest Man.

The trustees of the debts of the late Archbishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, hav declared a dividend of one and a half per cent. "It might well temper the satisfaction with which the creditors receive this money," says the Independent, "to remember that it comes from one honest man, ex-Governor Hoadley, who went as security for a trustee who speculated with the funds in his hands and lost them, so that this dividend does not come from the legitimate source."

Yes, and it may well temper the arrogance of the Christian church to remember that this one honest man—about the only one connected with the affair who can be thus described—is an Infidel, a disbeliever in the church, a rejecter of revelation, a scoffer at supernaturalism. He went on the bond of a supposed friend, and when the fellow turned out to be a faithful follower of the archbishop, Governor Hoadley paid his debt like a man—almost impoverishing himself and family to do it. The mighty Roman Catholic church is on the bond of the dead prelate, but she has not repaid the millions Purcell stole from his witless dupes.

All honor to Governor Hoadley! Everlasting disgrace to the Roman Catholic church.

Paying the Penalty of Independence.

The World has it upon authority that the Rev. Dr. Edward McGlynn, of St. Stephen's church, is to be deposed from his priestly office because of his adoption of the land theories of Henry George, and for his activity in electioneering for that gentleman.

The World expresses the opinion that this is "too severe a punishment," because "few men did more than Dr. McGlynn to secure the nomination of Governor Cleveland for president, by the timely and effectiv assurance which he gave at the final moment that the voters whose interests he had at heart would support that nomination."

This is a remarkable reason to advance. Is the election of Mr. Cleveland to the presidency of such value to the Roman Catholic church that she must pay for it? If so, Democracy is a dangerous foe to America. The public is always told by church authorities that the church never interferes in politics. But here we hav it from a journal high in the counsels of the dominant party, that one priest pledged in advance the votes of his parish for a candidate. What becomes of the pretense of the church with this fact known? Why did not the church drive Dr. McGlynn from his pulpit for his activity for Cleveland if she must do it because of his labors for George? The principle is the same, though the church may hav more reasons to fear a reform movement than the election of the candidate of a party pledged to conservativ rule.

But at any rate we hope Dr. McGlynn is to be deposed now. His deposal will go a long way to prove him an honest man. During the campaign there were two opinions concerning him. One was that he was Jesuitically foisting himself upon the labor party with the design of controling it; the other opinion called him an honest man, and less a believer in the church than a lover of humanity. Charity inclined to the latter opinion; a knowledge of the history of the church made it appear doubtful.

At the present time the Roman Catholic authorities are evidently disturbed by the organization of labor, and especially by the adherence of so many Catholics to Henry George's theories. In his recent pastoral letter, Archbishop Corrigan devoted about one-fourth of his document to overthrowing Mr. George's land theory, denouncing it as contrary to God's law and will. "To strive to base an argument against ownership in land," says the archbishop, "by reasoning on the universal distribution of air and light is only a freak of the imagination. Human industry cannot scatter a cloud from before the face of the sun, nor lift a fog that may be freighted with damaging vapors; we take the air and the light as God givs them, and we owe him thanks for his bounty. It was only the earth which fell under the primeval curse when man had sinned." Thus was Mr. George disposed of in an instant by reference to dogmatic authority. Now, according to all canons of the church, this opinion of Mr. Corrigan should also be the opinion of Dr. McGlynn. Unfortunately for Dr. McGlynn, however, he is unable to view the matter in that light. He agrees rather with Henry George's interpretation of the scriptures, that "the land is a free gift of the creator to all his children," because the "Lord saith" that "the land shall not be sold forever, for the land is mine." Saying nothing of the absurdity and weakness of an argument founded upon so false a dictum as the Jewish Bible, it is very evident that Dr. McGlynn must be excommunicated. He has no right to interpret the scriptures, nor to adopt the interpretation of any authority but the Roman Catholic church. His position as a priest makes him a mental slave, and if he will be free he must leave the church. The church does not want individuals, but automatons—men moved by wires and strings—puppets, playthings, tools, emissaries—all working as directed, and never working but as directed. Unless a priest is such a dummy, his services are of but little utility to the holy organization. Dr. McGlynn will probably hav to go.

An Erring Apologist.

In the current number of one of the best of our monthlies is an essay by W. S. Lilly upon the present outlook for Christianity. Mr. Lilly's paper is temperate and good-natured, and he states the case against Christianity fairly and well. It is from his conclusions that the skeptic will differ, not because of their unreasonableness, but because of their misleading nature. As a defender of Christianity, Mr. Lilly transplants it to grounds upon which logically it cannot grow. With this transplanting we hav no quarrel, but the world should understand the true facts.

"Without controversy," says Mr. Lilly, "Christianity appears to many of the wisest to be at the present day in deadlier peril than it has been at any time during the eighteen hundred years of its existence. For the attack is not directed so much against any one doctrin, or class of doctrins, peculiar to it, as against the very fundamental position whereon it rests. That position is the existence of a First Cause, absolutely good, wise, and powerful, who has created the universe for a beneficent end, and who may be known and served by his rational creatures, if they will to know and serve him. Christianity is primarily theism, and theism is very widely called in question, and denied. At the same time—so close is the link which binds together the human personality and the divine—all that has hitherto been considered distinctivly characteristic of man likewise suffers an eclipse—his freedom of volition, his moral responsibility, his spirituality and immortality. If we would form any sound judgment upon the present outlook for Christianity, we must consider first the prospects of theism. If anti-theistic theories, whether in the form of Materialism, Agnosticism, or Atheism, are to prevail, of course there is an end of Christianity, as of all other religions."

To maintain Christianity intact, then, Mr. Lilly endeavors to prove the absolute truth of theism, and to his aid he summons the philosophers who hav expressed a belief in a force which might hav more or less influence in determining phenomena. He quotes Professor Huxley as recognizing "the necessity for cherishing the noblest and most human of man's emotions by worship, mostly of the silent sort, at the altar of the unknown and unknowable;" Professor Tyndall as making profession of faith in Kant's transcendental idealism; Herbert Spencer as believing in an unknown and unknowable power, without limit in space, without beginning or end in time; M. Littré, whom he calls the second founder of Positivism, as recognizing "immensity, physical and intellectual, as a positiv idea of the first order." The first three philosophers, Mr. Lilly declares to be the three men who most powerfully influence the most intelligent portion of the English-speaking race. Mr. Lilly argues from these expressions that a belief in a deity is inherent in the race; that its universality proves its truth; and that the power behind phenomena recognized by the men quoted is the same as the Christian God, only refined by his evolution from the deity of a barbaric people to the indefinit sense of an ultimate reality of speculativ philosophers. But as these speculativ abstractions are too cold for worship, Mr. Lilly gratuitously assumes that they will end in the acceptance of Christian theism, whose God he defines as follows:

"A Supreme Being, the Creator, Upholder, Governor, and Sovereign Lord of all; self-dependent, and the only Being who is such; Eternal, and the only Eternal; all-sufficient, all-blessed, and ever-blessed; the Supreme Good; omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent, ineffably one, absolutely perfect; sovereign over his own actions, though always according to the eternal Rule of right and wrong, which is himself; yet in the works of creation, conservation, government, retribution, making himself, as it were, the minister and servant of all; taking an interest, and having a sympathy, in the matters of time and space, and imposing on rational beings, in whose hearts he has written the moral law, the duty of worship and service."

Such a God, he thinks, will fill the long-felt want, and is moreover a deity built in accordance with Spencer's dictum that "perpetual self-adaptation to environment is the very law of life."

Now, all this is very flattering to the English philosophers, and consoling to the Christians, but it has no more to do with "the present outlook for Christianity" than it has with the present outlook for Mohammedanism. In the first place, theism is not Christianity. In the second, a God that grows, that changes, that is subject, as it were, to the law of varieties of species, is just no God at all, and certainly as far from being the God of the Christians as a protoplasmic speck is from being a man. Mr. Lilly confounds theism with a religion which, if reduced to simple theism, would lose by far its most important dogmas, and become impotent. The theists of the present day are ranked by church authorities with the Infidels, and those authorities will not thank the apologist for reducing their religion to the strait he has. If Christianity survives among intelligent people only through the support given to the least of its dogmas by philosophers who are hostil to the whole system, the present outlook is gloomy indeed. We heartily wish it were true.

Sunday Laws.

The small number of arrests made last Sunday for violating the Sunday laws indicates, says the Times, that the law was very generally observed. Except in the Bowery, the stores closed their doors at ten o'clock, and the proprietors presumably went to church. Nearly all of the arrests made were of Jewish merchants, but they had to be discharged because the law provides that when a person observes his own special holy day he cannot be forced to keep Sunday as well.

The labor unions interested in forcing the Sunday closing hav announced their intention of appealing to the legislature for a law empowering policemen to arrest Sabbath-breakers without a warrant and without actually seeing the violation of the law. Such a law would be unconstitutional, however, and it is not likely that the legislators will enact it.

Not only in this city is the effort being made to revive the puritanical Sunday, but strong efforts are being made all over the country to close all business houses. In Boston, Indianapolis, and elsewhere, the church folks hav induced the authorities to make arrests for Sabbath-breaking, and if the agitation is kept up, the prospects for obtaining the repeal of the laws will be good. No one wants to see the obsolete laws of decades ago enforced, and if the clergy persist, public indignation is likely to be sufficiently aroused to demand the repeal of all Sabbatarian legislation. Nine-tenths of all the people in the country are habitual Sabbath-breakers, and if all are to be arrested, the jails will be pretty well filled. The contract, we think, is too large a one for the clergy, and they will be forced to moderate their zeal. As a writer in the Sun says, it would be a case of the tail wagging the dog. In Boston the attempt to enforce the law is being made for the purpose of making it so odious that the legislature will repeal it, and the attempt, it is said, is likely to be successful. If so, some good will be accomplished, and the example will be useful in other cities.

For the Constitutional Convention.

In 1885 was organized in this city the "Central Committee for Protecting and Perpetuating the Separation of Church and State." The organizing secretary is Charles M. Plumb, and his chief supporter is Henry A. Cram, one of the managers of the House of Refuge on Randall's Island. The outward object of the society is to prevent any recognition by the state of any particular sect. The inside idea is to prevent the legislature from giving Roman Catholics any foothold in the House of Refuge, for which, under the name of the "Freedom of Worship Bill," they hav been besieging the legislature for half a score of years.

Since the voters of this state hav decided to hav a Constitutional Convention, the society has held one meeting, at which Mr. Plumb egotistically intimated that the society for Protecting and Perpetuating the Separation of Church and State had procured the calling of this convention, and recommends that upon the attention of the convention be impressed the following amendment to the constitution: "The legislature shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or enforcing the dogmas of any creed, or the rites or ceremonies of any sect."

The adoption of such an amendment would prohibit the legislature from interfering in any case, and leave the managers of every institution free to work their own will upon the helpless inmates of their religious dens. This would suit Mr. Henry A. Cram, whose idea of a non-sectarian institution is the House of Refuge, the manual of instruction of which is saturated in every page with the narrowest Christian sectarianism. The Society for Protecting and Perpetuating the Separation of Church and State proposes to continue this Christian sectarianism, and to make Protestantism a part of our organic law.

When the delegates to the Constitutional Convention are chosen and meet in session, we think there will be submitted an amendment which will meet the case more fully, and put our state in line with the United States Constitution. We need to not only prohibit the establishment of religion, but to actually prohibit the giving of money to any institution in which religion of any kind is taught.

Presbyterian Trial for Heresy.

The evangelical controversy over evolution, of which Dr. Woodrow, of the Columbia, S. C., Theological Seminary, has been the center, has at last been settled by the removal of Dr. Woodrow from his professorship of natural science in conjunction with Revelation. Dr. Woodrow accepts this action as the authoritativ voice of his church.

This action also records where Presbyterianism stands as to the science of evolution. Dr. Woodrow's offending consists in his teaching this science instead of accepting Genesis as the explanation of the origin and development of life. Four synods and a board of directors hav condemned him for it, and his removal will unquestionably please the great body of Presbyterians, who are as pig-headed as Roman Catholics in rejecting the latest words of science.

A few years ago a Presbyterian minister of Illinois enjoyed "the luxury of a little honest thought, and the real rapture of expressing it," and he was expelled for heresy. Of this action of the presbytery, Colonel Ingersoll said: "Go on, presbyteries and synods, go on! Thrust the heretics out of the church—that is to say, throw away your brains—put out your eyes. The Infidels will thank you. They are willing to adopt your exiles. Every deserter from your camp is a recruit for the army of progress. Cling to the ignorant dogmas of the past; read the 109th Psalm; gloat over the slaughter of mothers and babes; thank God for total depravity; shower your honors upon hypocrits, and silence every minister who is touched with that heresy called genius. Be true to your history. Turn out the astronomers, the geologists, the naturalists, the chemists, and all the honest scientists. With a whip of scorpions, drive them all out. We want them all. Keep the ignorant, the superstitious, the bigoted, and the writers of charges and specifications. Keep them, and keep them all. Repeat your pious platitudes in the drowsy ears of the faithful, and read your Bible to heretics, as kings read some forgotten riot-act to stop and stay the waves of revolution. You are too weak to excite anger. We forgiv your efforts as the sun forgivs a cloud—as the air forgivs the breath you waste."

The Board of Directors of the Columbia Theological Seminary and the Board of Visitors of the Andover Theological Seminary ought to be compelled to read Mr. Ingersoll's comments upon trials for heresy.

Editorial Notes.

THE United Labor Party of Philadelphia at its second convention adopted the declaration of principles without the phrase, "Fatherhood of God." This omission was due to the energetic protest of W. J. Gorsuch, the well-known Anarchist orator. It is encouraging that Mr. Gorsuch was strongly enough supported in the party to force the omission of these meaningless words.

MRS. LILLIAN WALKER is out of jail, her sentence having expired. Mr. Walker has yet nearly a month to stay in prison. Mrs. Walker was released on the 4th inst. Their case is before the supreme court, but Mr. Walker's sentence will probably expire before the court considers it. After Judge Crozier's decision that they are legally married, keeping these two persons in prison is not far from a legal outrage.

IN confuting Mr. Henry George, Archbishop Corrigan laid down this solid foundation upon which to argue:

"When any thought finds a welcome abode in the mind and becomes so clear to him who harbors it as to shape itself into a principle, it is a duty to scan closely its character and bearing, and to trace its possible course from the quiet haven of the mind to the open main of public fact. However fair or shapely or attractiv it may seem to the unwary, it should not be accepted by the prudent unless it is formed of elements that are altogether sound and pure. A flaw in a foundation represents a proportionate insecurity in the building raised upon it."

The archbishop ought to hav borne his own statement in mind when using the "primeval curse" against Mr. George's theories. And Mr. George evidently overlooked this paragraph when he quoted the Old Testament against the archbishop. Both of these eminent disputants built very flimsy argumentativ walls upon foundations full of flaws. They are intellectual Buddensieks.

THE Ironclad Age for December 11th has three and a half weary columns of disguised abuse of THE TRUTH SEEKER for saying that the Chicago Anarchists ought not to be hanged as a result of the "trial." The good doctor who edits the Age quotes a signed note of Si Slokum's in this paper, credits it to the editor, and exclaims, "This the country is to understand as the authoritativ declaration of organized Secularism!" In THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 28th, September 5th, and subsequently, the editor furnished, to those who wanted to know, a full statement of the grounds upon which he based his opposition to hanging these men. He cannot, however, undertake to furnish brains for some editors to understand what he wrote, nor honesty for them to do justice with.

THE managers of the New York House of Refuge, it is well known, hav opposed the Freedom of Worship bill whenever it has come before the New York legislature. Recently Judge Acker, connected with this institution, died, and his relativs asked permission to bury him from the cathedral in this city. Archbishop Corrigan refused, giving as his reason Mr. Acker's opposition to the Freedom of Worship bill. He further caused it to be made known that no Catholic connected with the House of Refuge could be buried from the cathedral so long as he is archbishop. This is a good way to punish enemies, but not a very dreadful one—far easier for the enemies than the old-time practice of killing them by torture. But as showing the implacable spirit of the church it is significant.

THE Concord Labor Club gave Henry George a dinner on the 6th inst. The dinner, the public is informed, was good—the oysters cold, the soup hot, the fish well done, the entrees just right, the game tender, the salads well mixed, the wine not too strong, and with a piquant bouquet, and the cigars made in Havana, not in First-avenue tenement houses. It was a dinner of laborers, so the advertisment said, but with the exception of a car-driver, used as a substitute, the speakers were professional men. There was of course a ghost at the banquet—there never was a political banquet without one since Judas put his hand in the dish with Christ. Along with the wine and cigars came toasts, and the very first toast was, "Labor and Religion: Next to Faith in One's God, is Faith in Labor." Always that ghost of a fleshless God—a God who never helped a human being, who sees millions die of want and suffering, who crushes his human flies in earthquakes, kills them with famin and pestilence, and then burns them in a hell forever—as these drinkers to this toast believe. Next to one's faith in God is faith in labor! And it was a reverend who responded, who taught these laborers this wicked doctrin! What folly! Until the laborer puts his faith in labor ahead of his faith in God, the right to a banquet they pay for is about all the right the Henry George folks will get, and the skeptical sons of Faust, who we are informed were there, ought to hav said so instead of applauding the Rev. Mr. Kramer. They might hav remembered Dr. McGlynn, summoned to Rome—perhaps to be disrobed—for the part he took in the election last fall. The church of Rome is the voice of that God among whose suffering poor these toast-drinkers are endeavoring "one gleam of brotherhood to send."

AT the Baptist ministers' weekly conference Monday, says the Sun, the Rev. D. Frank R. Morse of the tabernacle in Brooklyn, read an essay on "Christianity versus Materialism," and said in the discussion that followed that, as he had heard, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll does not himself believe a word he says against Christianity. The Rev. Dr. Morse related as what he had heard that several years ago Colonel Ingersoll got into financial difficulty, and, knowing that the income from his business would not tide him over his troubles, he hit upon the plan of lecturing against Christianity as the course most likely to pay. Colonel Ingersoll, in evening dress, with a carnation in his buttonhole, and a lustrous diamond on the vast expanse of his snowy shirt front, was a smiling guest at the dinner of the Thirteen Club at Morelli's restaurant Monday night. After reading the Rev. Dr. Morse's remarks Colonel Ingersoll very carefully laid his napkin across his left knee and remarked sententiously, "Paper." Then Colonel Ingersoll rapidly wrote as follows: "Evidently the Rev. Mr. Morse is not a gentleman. There is not one word of truth in his statement. I hav never uttered a word on the subject of superstition that I did not thoroughly believe to be true. It is easy to see how a man might pretend to be a Christian, but it is impossible to conceive of a man who really believes in Christianity denying it. This is impossible, especially in a country where the majority are known as Christians. The Rev. Mr. Morse ought to hav the manners of a well-bred man. He should answer my arguments, not attack my motivs. Would he preach Infidelity if he had brains enough to make it pay? Would he consider it fair for me to charge that he selected his profession because it is the only one in which stupidity can hope for success?"

Astonishing Information.

From a Sermon by Rev. C. M. Cobern, Detroit, Mich.

Anthony Comstock is a Christian man, a constant foe to impurity, and for many years has done nothing else except to use all legal means to protect the morals of our youth. He is a man of conviction and courage, and fears the face of no one while fighting the battle of purity. At the peril of his life he has obtained the conviction of hundreds of dealers in low and debasing literature. He arrested the president of the Liberal League in the presence of two hundred and fifty of his friends.

Letters from Friends.

MERRICK, L. I., Dec. 6, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read the pamphlet "Personal Existence After Death Improbable," by L. R. Smith. I find it interesting and instructiv. I think every Liberal would do well to send for one or more copies to hand to their Christian friends, if they hav any. You can send me one dozen. The author is very desirous to hav humanity to understand that this life is the only one that we need trouble ourselvs about. E. HYATT.

ROME CITY, IND., Nov. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: We hav had the pleasure of listening to two lectures by J. L. Andrew, of Fort Scott, Kan.

Mr. Andrew is a logical orator, and calls things by their right names. His arguments are convincing, and delivered in a way that is not calculated to giv offense to opponents. He shows up the absurdities of the doctrins of superstitious religion in fine style, and Liberal societies wanting lectures will do well to employ Mr. Andrew. ITHAMAR EDDY.

DEXTERVILLE, WIS., Dec. 2, 286.

MR. EDITOR: You will please find inclosed $1, for which giv me credit. I wish I could send you more, but I hav been unable to dispose of very many of the last lot of pamphlets I got of you, but I will remit as often as possible, and will endeavor to get settled up with you soon.

I hope to get a few engagements to lecture in Wisconsin as soon as I am through teaching for the winter, and would like to announce through your paper that I am desirous of corresponding with activ Liberals of Wisconsin with a view to lecturing. GEO. H. DAWES.

GALION, O., Dec. 4, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER finds its way here regularly every week, and, do you know, it is doing some good? [We trust so.—ED.] Your stand taken in regard to Parsons and the other condemned men is examplary. You hav the support of all truly freedom-loving people. We hav times now as in the past when men's souls are tried.

I wish to tell through your paper that we hav engaged the services of J. E. Remsburg, one of America's Freethinkers, for one lecture, which will take place Dec. 14, 1886. All arrangements necessary are already made. We are all expectancy. JOHN P. FLICK.

MYRTLE POINT, OR., Nov. 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I wrote to you last summer to stop my paper when my subscription expired, but I will take it all back. And as you hav been good enough to send me the paper I will pay for it, for I know that it costs money to run any kind of business. Not that I like the pictures any more. Find inclosed $5 for the next two years. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER as well as ever, and I believe that I could not get along without it.

We had three soul agents here to talk to us the last three weeks. I believe they made but one convert, and they imported him from Josephine county. So, wishing you all success, I remain, Yours respectfully, C. LEHMHERE.

SOLDIER'S HOME, WIS., NOV. 22, A.S. 286.

MR. EDITOR: The most astounding mystery to me is the devout adoration paid by our orthodox friends to certain Bible passages that hav no meaning whatever. For instance, Matt. xxi, 21: "If ye hav faith and doubt not, thou shalt say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea, and it shall be done." Now, these same honest-minded men and women are far from being idiots or fools in all other matters secular, yet they cling with frienzied persistence to the most absurd babbling of a barbarous age, and imagin in their hearts that it is the very essence of inspired wisdom. Why is this? I confess it is absolutely beyond my comprehension. It might as well hav been recorded in that book of wonders, "If you hav sufficient faith you can wipe out the sun with a rag;" and who among our Christian friends would dare to doubt it, and put their souls in jeopardy? "Suffer little children to come unto me," etc. No wonder that these feeble-minded dupes are striving to imitate children, ignoring their manhood and their womanhood, and crushing out reason and common-sense in order to escape this marvelous seething hell so vividly set forth by Jesus, Calvin, Edwards, and others. But they must not ignore the fact that, according to good orthodox authority, some of the children are in hell, and hence their chances for heaven are slim in spite of all their childishness.

NELSON HUNT.

AYER, MASS., Dec. 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me the book entitled "Prose Poems and Selections," by R. G. Ingersoll, and twelve "Lay Sermons."

THE TRUTH SEEKER is a welcome weekly visitor, fraught with good things—tidings of great joy. Scriptures need not be two thousand years old to be appreciated and understood.

L. K. Washburn and John Peck plow deep into old theology—the thing called Christianity. It has become permeated through and through with dry-rot, and can't bear its own weight. It is past being again kiln-dried in hot revivals. The torch of truth is too much for its decayed condition. It is only a question of time when it will molder away beneath the sands of tradition.

The religion of this world, the religion of common sense, the religion that knows no sect, no creed, no shackles for the mind nor dungeon for the body, is the religion we need. Where is the greatest knowledge of the laws, where there is the least assumption of might over right, where there is the least fear, where individual responsibility reigns supreme, where is the most freedom—there is the best society. These are, at least, the elements of peace and fraternity. Let the torch of reason burn. Let every man carry it, and pass it from hand to hand that it may shed light in all dark corners of our beautiful earth—in all Christian lands. Let it light up the horizon of the rising intellect, and be to it a bow of promis that the human mind shall never again be deluged by any religious fraud, and a guarantee that its loathsome foot may never again tread upon this grand earth, destined to be a home of beauty and joy to the human race.

ELIJAH MYRICK.

NEWARK, N. J., Nov. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Last winter I went to New Brunswick on business. Passing up Nelson street, I saw a very plain, Methodistical-looking church, with a large cross in front of the building. I knocked at the door of a two-story tenement, and was surprised to see a Sister of Charity answer my summons. I begged pardon, and said I did not know that sisters dwelt here. "Oh," she answered, "you want the father." I replied, "No, marm; nor the son nor daughter;" and turned, bade her good-bye, and knocked at the next door, where I was again surprised to see Mr. Martien—rather Frenchy way of spelling Martin—answer my second call. His reverence, with the three-cornered hat, inquried my business. I informed him. He answered, no; they were sweet enough. "Yes," said I, "you look sweet enough—and fat, too." He smiled at my reply, and he followed me out to the gate. A carpenter was repairing the gate and fence. One of the posts was very rotten. I turned, and said to this man of God that the post reminded me of a great many people in the world—full of rotteness and corruption. He smiled, and said, "We can cure them of their diseases." I replied, "You can cure nothing." He remained silent for a few moments, and then said, "May I inquire why I can't cure?" "Yes, sir. Your friend is dead—the devil. Intelligence knocked the life clean out of him, and kicked the bottom clean out of his hell; and you hav not got enough saints in your calendar to bring Old Nick to life again." He immediately turned and went in his house, without making any more inquiries. The carpenter thought his reverence had gone to digest the medicin I gave him. I answered that that was a very small dose. I would hav increased it if he had asked more questions. This gentleman's capital was a Bible and cross, rosary, prayer-book, and a few other pagan relics, that enabled him to set up himself and bring him in a large yearly income—to liv, laugh, and grow fat on ignorant, superstitious victims; and I suppose those sharpers think we Freethinkers ought to be burnt for daring to question their power of doing any good. I know, for a certainty, they impoverish the people and corrupt their morals. The mass is supposed to cleanse the soul of all sin; so the priest gets the money. The priest gets the best of the bargain. In fact, they are what I call the biggest skins on earth, and their god is the almighty dollar. They are simon-pure blasphemers. They claim to forgiv sins. What is bound on earth is bound in heaven. That is representing their God as a weather-cock, and they can persuade him to send a soul to heaven or to hell! Their blessing saves a soul; their excommunication damns it. I believe it is quite time to stop such sharpers from robbing and impoverishing the people.

W. W. MORRIS.

WAVERLY, WASH. TER., Nov. 28, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Is it not time that the women of our nation should lift their voices in the great cry of reform? Wives and mothers hav a right to mingle with those who are striving to benefit their fellow-beings; and why should we be careless and seemingly thoughtless of what regards ourselvs as a sex? Woman should surely take an interest in her own liberty and the liberty of her children. In raising her family, the mother's mind should be free from superstition and bigotry; for it is by the mother, in early youth, that the mind of the child is formed; and even in manhood the ideas given in youth are weighed and considered before they are cast aside. How sad a young man or woman must feel to think that the mother they loved taught them a religion that was false and contrary to nature and science. Let every woman read and study the scriptures without fear or prejudice; take them as you would the writings of any other book. Always be ready to say that what would be cruel in man would be worse than cruel in God, and be ready to denounce it, no matter where you find it.

The first place where woman is mentioned in the Bible is Gen. ii, 22. After the Lord had caused all the beasts of the earth to pass before Adam, there was no helpmeet found for him. If there had been in that grand procession an orang-outang, or baboon, or bald-faced monkey that would hav pleased his fancy, our charming selvs could hav been dispensed with. So you see it was merely by chance that we were created at all, and we are only a secondary part at any rate. But read Gen. iii, 16, and see the first sentence that was passed on a woman; passed on her by the very one that allowed her to do what she did; for if God is omniscient and omnipresent, he surely was standing right there, looking on when crime was committed, and therefore must be accessory to the same. Would it not hav been a blessing to us if he had made the serpent mute, or put a guard around the tree? Where were all his angels and his sons at that time? Could he not spare one to personally superintend the garden, at least until Eve became accustomed to things? No; it was better to give a curse on that day—one that could not be disputed, for it lasts until this day. Now, I ask you in honesty if you can believe such a nonsensical lie as is written in that sixteenth verse? What had the beasts done? Did they eat forbidden fruit? It is the same with them as with womankind.

According to the Bible narrativ, women had a good character until they allowed the sons of God to make love to them, and became their wives. It was then that trouble began in earnest; they were good wives and mothers for over one thousand five hundred years, but the sons of God made them otherwise. What a pity he did not keep his sons at home, or create them wives of their own ilk. They brought with them discord and hatred. If the Bible is true, God's grandsons were a very bad lot of unruly fellows. Only for them the great flood would not hav been necessary.

I think, if we look at it aright and pass an honest opinion, we will hav to say that God was the father of a very, very bad family. They must hav had a bad example at home.

The next point we examin is Gen. xii, 11, 12, 13. Sarai, Abram's wife, bemeans herself so that she may keep Abram's soul alive. He was afraid that the Egyptians would kill him, and that his soul would die. He did not seem to know as much about the soul as the priests and preachers of our day; he did not know that the soul lived forever and ever! What a pity he did not live in a time and place where he could hear Sam Jones! Sam would let him know that a soul like his would not die so easy. Then Sarai might hav been saved that great shame that is recorded against her. But how do we know that he was so afraid as he pretended? It may be that he had an eye after the sheep and the oxen, he asses and men servants, and maid servants, and camels that her shame would secure him (Gen. xii, 16).

Abram's orders to his wife Sarai concerning Hagar were: "Behold thy maid is in thy hand; do to her as it pleaseth thee" (Gen. xvi, 6).

I don't wonder that her lot was hard, for Sarai, I believe, had a right to be jealous, for I do not believe the story that she gave Hagar to Abram. It would hav been more like the old man to take her. It is not the nature of women to giv to their husbands other women. I think we would really need some of the genuin grace of God to do so. But poor Hagar could not stand her abuse any longer. There is none to pity her; even the old wretch himself has no sympathy in his nature for her. She flees to the wilderness for safety, and is found at the spring by the angel of the Lord (Gen. xvi, 7-9).

I often wonder if it was not old Abraham that presented himself fixed up in some disguise in order to tell her what he most desired she would do, which was to go back to her mistress again. It would hav sounded much better if he had said "master," for I do not think that Sarai wanted her, and an angel of the Lord should hav known as much.

Sisters of common nature, read and ponder. Listen to Gen. xix, 8, uttered by a chosen one of God. Remember these are only maidens, fair guardians of youth and modesty. But what a sentence, spoken by a father, to be listened to by a mother! If a father of two maidens of our land should make such an offer to a drunken mob, would you say he was a chosen one of God? Would you say he was a special favorit of the ruler of all nature! Would you say he was a special favorit of his? I would denounce him, I care not what he claimed. Just imagin how the hearts of those two maidens must hav fluttered when that father's word sounded in their ears. Their only protector, the father they loved, casting them to the wild beasts, as it were—for better to be thrown to a den of lions than to a brutal mob. But we must hope, if such a thing had transpired, that there would hav been some in the crowd who would hav offered protection.

From what she had seen and heard the night before (Gen. xix, 26) Mrs. Lot could not hav been feeling very well that morning of the flight from the burning city. Perhaps she thought the burning was only a joke, and I think so yet.

But nevertheless there are sensible women who believe the tale without giving it a thought. What great sin could there be in looking back at what the Lord was doing? Was it more sin to look on than to do in that case? Perhaps it was one look of heartfelt pity that she gave. But it makes no difference—she was turned to a pillar of salt. Lot did not seem to grieve much about the sad affair that happened to his wife. He went along on his journey without even passing a remark. Surely an event that has caused sermons to be preached and books to be written was worthy of his notice. I heard a preacher in Canada say that Lot's wife stood a firm pillar of salt until this day, and if by any cause a part became detached it immediately grew to its proper shape and form again. What a fine mine of wealth that would prove to be out here on this Washington territory prairie where salt is worth three cents per pound! I hav often wondered if D. M. Bennett failed to see the grand sight when he was in the Promised Land. I hav never heard it said that he saw anything like that there.

Wives and mothers, read Gen. xix, 31-38, and say that is a fit and proper example to set before your daughters. Is it fit to tell them that God honored the perpetrators of that crime? Can you say that the God of your religion sanctioned such a crime?—honored such daughters?—never gave one word of reproach to such a father? If you believe the brutal tale, it is there for you to read and teach to your daughters. I will not quote it.

It was now high time that Abram was moving, so he changes his abode and takes Sarai along (Gen. xx, 2). "And Abram said of Sarai his wife, She is my sister, and Abimelech king of Gerar sent and took her." The same old tale, "She is my sister," gets for Abram some more sheep, some more oxen, and some more men-servants and some more women-servants. Sarai was very profitable to Abraham, was she not?

Wives and mothers, if you would only take a reasonable view of these transactions, you would never dare to teach your children that they were divinely ordered. How much better it would be for you to tell them that they are myths and fables of a barbarous age of the long past!

I hav quoted only a few of the passages that allude to us as women. Some are too filthy to even refer to or to allow our children to look at. Why should we bind ourselvs down to a book whose chief characteristics are its vulgarity and obscenity, its thraldom and slavery of our sex? And still we do not try as we should to make ourselvs free. We should throw all superstition away, and strive to make our children free. MAGGIE HOPE GRAHAM.

WOODSTOCK, VT., Nov. 22, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: We cannot look ahead and see at all times what we will do. At the last of my writing to you, I said I am soon to pay to different ones that are working hard for our cause. But when THE TRUTH SEEKER came to hand, I noticed that there were to be printed extra numbers of that issue. This took my attention, for I knew of many of my friends who ought to know the sentiments of our friend Ingersoll. Therefore be so kind as to send along 50 cents' worth, and to fill out the program, and make my word good, I send C. B. Reynolds $3.00 for his benefit, $7.00 for the Campaign Fund, and $1.50 for pictures. This much for the cause for which I hav worked sixty-four years, beginning at the age of 17. Yours, JOHN D. POWERS.

[The number of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing Colonel Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon" is out of print, all our extra copies having been sold. Brother Powers's 50 cents will secure him one dozen copies of the sermon in a handsome pamphlet.—ED. T. S.]

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Nov. 24, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Brother Wetzel is right about the Walker infringement case upon patent-right marriage. We do not want the law to decree and construe cohabitation as legal marriage—no such obtrusiv, invasiv tyranny. Legal marriage be hanged! Let every tub stand on its own bottom. Let those who want legal marriage get it legally—go where they hav it to sell, buy it, and pay for it like a man; and those that prefer the simon-pure and unadulterated article of natural marriage, brew it at home and "say nothing to nobody."

No, all roads do not, and should not, lead to legal marriage, and as to the old and much-traveled route, do not let us shorten it an inch, or make it cheap and easy, as Walker is trying to do. It's good enough as it is, considering where it leads to. The toll ought to be five hundred dollars instead of five, and the red tape without beginning or end. The road in should be lined with briars and ballasted with brimstone and blasted hopes. The road out is the one that needs working. Make it wide and smooth and straight and free of toll, with free lunch and a band of music at every mile-post.

WM. S. ALLEN.

AYR, ONT. Nov. 30, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will please find the sum of $5, American currency.

This amount is to be applied as follows: Three dollars for renewed subscription to your paper, due on the 20th inst.; one dollar for assistance to the cartoons, and one dollar to go to the benefit of Mr. Reynolds, who has lately been prosecuted and persecuted for blasphemy (?), and with whom I deeply sympathize. I should hav remitted subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER earlier, but was endeavoring to get you a few subscribers, in which attempt I failed owing partly to prevalence of orthodoxy, but chiefly, no doubt, to the Scottish fondness for this world's gear.

I find the paper always interesting, and doubt much if you hav a more faithful reader than myself. Your exposure of the uniformed hypocrits who enjoy special privileges from government and society is a good work and in time is bound to open the eyes of many to the true character of these parasites. Their insolent interference with public questions in this country reminds me of their cruel and selfish attempt to debar the working classes of Scotland from healthy recreation. I am yours truly, PETER HOPE.

EMPORIA, KAN., Dec. 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER arrives regularly and fills the bill in every particular as a live Freethought paper. The pictures are O.K., and show up "orthodox trash" splendidly. I hav just been reading Dr. Whitford's books (printed by you). They are grand, and every Freethinker should get them and read them, as they are chockfull of original ideas. I wish that Mr. Heston would execute a picture of the orthodox heaven and hell, with old Jew Jehovah on his pinnacle in one apartment surrounded by his Winslows, Purcells, etc., and the old prong-footed devil in another shoveling brimstone into Peter Cooper, James Lick, Stephen Girard, and others. It would do for framing. I believe Mr. Heston could do the subject justice. I take THE TRUTH SEEKER and Boston Investigator. I read all the good things contained in them each week and then place them in a large box called my "missionary box," and when twenty-five copies accumulate I take them and distribute them among workingmen and women, and thus encourage and build up opposition and Infidelity to the Christian superstition. I would rejoice to see every church in America eradicated by truth's powerful weapons, and on their ruins erected shining halls of science wherein all could stand upon a common platform and learn something each week that would benefit the present as well as future generations.

Yours for progress, truth, and liberty, M. WELCH.

FARMDALE, O., Dec. 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. J. E. Remsburg has just finished a course of lectures—five in number—to the ungodly people of this vicinity. He had a good audience at each lecture, and they were well pleased, especially with the last one, "Bible Morals." The lectures were admittance free, and we hope to hav the pleasure of hearing Mr. Remsburg in the future. Our band is somewhat small, but all in earnest. Quite a number improved the opportunity and stepped forward and procured a sample copy of your paper, distributed by our able speaker. We regret very much that Mr. Thompson was not able to be out, as he was very badly hurt by falling off his barn a few days ago, but we are pleased to state that he is doing as well as could be expected, and Mr. Remsburg called on him at his home.

Professor O. E. Henry's full orchestra furnished us with a choice selection of music, and we had also some very fine vocal music by Mr. Shipman and son, assisted by Mr. Merl Clisby at the organ. Mention is also due Messrs. Root Bros. for the free use of their large and commodious hall, for which the Liberals are all thankful to them. Mr. Thomas Douglas, of Warren, was out and stayed through the lectures. He made a few short addresses, and was well cheered. May he liv several years yet to enjoy himself as he did here, is the best wish of his Liberal friends. In closing I would say, May it be our good luck to hav a few more such orators as Mr. Remsburg visit us. I. N. PAYNE.

JASPER, TENN., Dec. 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Some years ago I was teaching school eighteen miles from home, and boarding with a gentleman of the name of Davidson Cunningham. I slept with his son, Riley, who went to school to me. Riley being the farthest advanced in education, I associated with him at recess and noon for the sake of his company. One Thursday, just as I had dismissed school at twelve for dinner, there came over me a sensation that something was wrong at home, and I asked Riley Cunningham to teach school for me until Monday following, telling him as a reason that there was something the matter at home. Riley laughed and said, "O pshaw!"—just what I would hav said, perhaps, to him under like circumstances. I taught the school myself as though nothing had happened, but I could not shake off the feeling that all was not well at home. That night, about twelve o'clock, some one hallooed. Being awake, I answered him, at the same time waking Riley, who was sleeping with me. The person at the gate told me that one of my boys had died at twelve o'clock on Thursday, and he had come after me to go home. I said to Riley, "What did I tell you, Riley?" Will some of your readers please explain how it was that I had the warning of evil at the time, if our spirits do not leave the body and liv independent of it? One more experience of mine, and I am done for the present. I was riding along a mountain road in company with a gentleman. I had never traveled the road before in my life. All at once I came to a place that I knew perfectly well, and described the country for some distance, describing a farm and house beyond a corner of the road half a mile ahead. I remarked to the gentleman with me that I had a very queer feeling somehow, and told him I could not account for it, that I never had been in that country before, and I would like for him to explain the thing. He was well acquainted with the whole country, and when I told him of the house and farm on the road half a mile beyond, he said I had described it correctly. I could not see the farm or the house at the time, as it was beyond the turn of the road. I was not looking at it, never had seen it in my life. Will some scientific reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER explain the singular phenomena? I am not superstitious, and do not believe in witches, hobgoblins, or ghosts. I am only stating solid truths, that hav puzzled me no little, as I am somewhat inclined to be an Infidel; at least, I do not believe all the Bible of the Christians. Hav any of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER ever had any such experience? I hav read Abercrombie's "Mental Philosophy," and other scientific works, and can't get any sensible explanation of the circumstance.

I rarely tell the above to any one, knowing their unreasonableness, and I like for people to believe me when I tell a thing. But it honestly is true, every word of it.

Respectfully, AMOS J. GRIFFITH.

MILFORD, MASS., Dec. 3, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read Colonel Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon," and the first thing that he wants me to remember is that "everybody is as he must be." The priest puts forth his foreordination doctrin for an imaginary world, and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER remember, but do not believe it. The foreordination stated above is as positiv as that of the priest, and applies to this world. I can remember, but do not believe in, such foreordination—no "must be."

Again: "When you know that they are not responsible for their acts any more than for their dreams." I believe that responsibility teaches as nothing else can. Colonel Ingersoll in one of his lectures spoke in praise of purgatory, as it gave a chance for a new hearing. This foreordination precludes the idea of a new hearing, as "must be" is a finality.

Again: "There is only one good, and that is human happiness; and he only is a wise man who makes himself happy." Who is not anxious to be happy? People everywhere are in motion like a swarm of bees in search of something that will contribute to their happiness, even by inflicting injuries upon others.

A million may be gained by negro gangs,
Who groan beneath church-going Christians' fangs;
Yet bring with it remorse. The juggling priests
Say negroes unbaptized are only beasts,
And pious rum-and-sugar-dealing knaves
Prove from their Bible niggers should be slaves.
But what's this scramble for? What object's gained?
Is real happiness thereby attained?

We hav more control over our happiness than is usually thought. The more people learn to depend on themselvs, the nearer they come to being happy. A Pennsylvania woman who went to Kansas a few years ago writes back that she has done as well as could be expected under the circumstances. She has had three husbands, two pairs of twins, and the ague. We do not know the circumstances in her case, nor what her expectations were, but she was evidently nearer the enjoyment of happiness than many a woman who has not been afflicted with three husbands to enable her to enjoy two pairs of twins and the ague. Any happiness, to be enduring, must come from a knowledge of the force within us, and a determination to make them inure for our good. Mind acts upon mind, and is potent for good or evil. Can a person's mind act upon itself? It must, in order to attain to a condition of happiness. You are impulsiv; often get angry—no one is happy in that frame of mind. You know the failing as well as those who see and dread its manifestation. Knowing a danger lessens it half; forewarned is forearmed. The good man is not the man that is born good, but the man who overcomes evil tendencies and becomes good. See to it that we counteract tendencies within us to do many things that bring in their train unhappiness. Do not repeat them. You burn your right hand—it is never intentionally repeated, not even as an experiment to see if the left one will burn. We must change the currents of our minds as the current of a river is changed to utilize it. The change will enlarge the mind, which is a prerequisit to happiness.

Again, he says: "Let us teach our children: it is your business to see that you never become a burden on others. Teach your son that it is his duty not only, but his highest joy, to become a home-builder, a home-owner." These two ideas tend to happiness; they ought to be taught to the daughter as well as the son. She is a home-builder, and to be a home-owner is her salvation. Liberals above all others should liv out those ideas and not be dependent.

Inclosed find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1887. This act always produces happiness to all concerned, and I hav no doubt you will acknowledge me to be a wise man.

Beware of debt! Once in, you'll be
A slave forever more.
If credit tempt you, thunder, "No!"
And show it to the door.
Cold water and a crust of bread
May be the best you'll get;
Accept them like a man and swear,
"I'll never run in debt!"

CHARLES C. JOHNSON.

ADAIR CREEK, TENN., Dec. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In a late number of your valuable paper you publish a long and interesting letter from A. Moot, upon the much-disputed question: Will wheat turn into chess? As a farmer, I used to hear this question discussed years ago, and hav for a long time believed that those who answered it in the affirmativ were mistaken, and I had accepted as correct the old explanation that when the wheat seed was killed, the chess seed, being in the soil, took its place. But of late years I hav made a special study of the laws of heredity, and I am now inclined to believe that wheat turns to chess through the process which is called reversion.

This letter is meant as a brief statement of what is meant by reversion, and it may explain the turning of wheat into chess.

According to the theory of evolution, every plant or animal now existing is the outcome or result of the development of some simpler forms. At one time, far back into the past, there was in existence upon the earth none of the numerous plants which now cover it. Some other kinds of plants, better adapted to the then condition of the atmosphere, alone had possession of the surface of the earth. We cannot tell how from these simple forms all the complex and various kinds now existing hav been developed, but we hav enough traces of the process left to teach us that it was done by the gradual development of some innate force or principle, which I call potentiality, which impelled the gradual unfolding of these simple forms into more complex ones, these several combinations specializing themselvs into different lines, each following its own line of development. This gradual evolution is only possible by the transmission through heredity of the knowledge acquired by each plant, and thus made available to its successors. Heredity is a form of memory—specific memory, M. Ribot calls it. It is a form of unconscious or latent memory, which supplies to the germ the necessary knowledge to enable it to control its own development, and this memory goes back to the very beginning of the development of the organism, the stages of growth of the human germ being found to correspond to, and form an epitome of, the development of all the lower forms which preceded it.

Reversion is a lapse of the latter part of this memory. For some cause, the germ remembers well enough the first part of its necessary knowledge, but, forgetting the last portion, the final development ceases, and the plant, animal, or man reverts to some ancient and undeveloped type. Such examples are very common. Idiots are cases of reversion, where the man fails to develop and reverts to some prehistoric type. The seed of grafted fruit always reverts to its original type, and produces only wild or natural fruit. When improved seeds degenerate, as it is called, it is simply a case of reversion. The knowledge of the law of reversion enables us to explain many phenomena which were inexplicable before.

Applying this knowledge to wheat and chess, nothing seems to me more probable than that chess is one of the lower forms of development through which wheat passed before it attained the present stage. Very likely chess was for a long time adapted to the existing conditions, and thus has become fixed and persistent and easily reverted to; and whenever the seed of wheat is unfavorably affected by certain conditions, it fails to remember all its experience, and reverts back to the chess condition. This seems so much more possible, that the same thing happens with the improved tomato. Its seed, if carefully gathered and protected in winter, will reproduce itself; but, if left to spend the winter subject to the inclemency of the weather, it will produce the cherry tomato—that is, revert to a semi-wild condition.

I do not giv it as a proven fact that wheat reverts back into chess, for the chain of proof needed to establish the fact has never been followed; yet I believe, if a person was sufficiently interested, it could be done. But the presumption that it is the true explanation seems to me very great. The explanation that the seed of the chess is in the ground, and supplants the wheat, is at best a very lame one; and I only accepted it because, with the old belief in spontaneous creation, no other explanation was possible; but it is somewhat strange, if it is the case, that in this country it is never new seeded wheat which turns to chess, but voluntary wheat—that is, wheat which seeds itself from the droppings of another crop.

I shall be pleased if Mr. Moot and others interested in the subject will take what I hav written into consideration and experiment, so as to throw some more light upon a very interesting question. ALBERT CHAVANNES.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Bedlam in the Kitchen.

"Molly, put the kettle on,
Jimmy, bring some wood,
Sally, you look out for Lou,
Sammy, you be good;
Molly, now you sweep the floor,
Sammy, stop that din,
Sally, don't you shut the door,
Jimmy's coming in."

"Mammy, gimme piece o' cake,"
Lou, the youngest, cries;
"Mother, Sam has got the rake,"
Sally yells, and ties
Tommy in his little chair;
Sammy "cutting stick,"
Molly clutching at his hair,
Sammy all too quick.

Jimmy, with the wood comes in,
Sammy trips him up,
Tommy givs a rueful grin,
Molly kicks the pup;
Puppy yells and scampers off,
Sally clutches Sam,
Tommy now begins to cough,
Mother brings the jam.

"Mother, Sally's hittin' me,"
Sammy loudly bawls;
"Mother, there's a bumble-bee,"
Molly shrilly squalls;
"Gyp, you stop that yelpin', quick,"
Mother sternly cries,
Sammy bellows. "There comes Dick,
Sally, mind your eyes!"

Dick comes in with ball and bat,
Sally quickly flits,
Sammy stumbles o'er the cat,
Pussy yowls and spits;
"Jimmy, you pick up that wood,"
Mother loud exclaims;
Dick cries, "Jimmy ain't no good,"
Jimmy calls him names.

"Jimmy, now you fill the stove,"
Mother cries severe;
Jim to Dick: "Oh, what a cove!"
Dick then cuffs his ear;
Sammy slyly "hooks" some jam,
Sally mother tells,
Sammy cries "Ain't you a lamb?"
Tommy loudly yells.

Dick sings out, "Oh, stop the noise!"
Sally cries, "Oh, hush!"
Molly says, "You awful boys!"
Sammy, "Hear her gush!"
Polly in her cage now shrieks,
"Molly, ain't you proud?"
"Mother, how the kettle leaks!"
Jimmy cries aloud.

Mother cries, "Oh, such a din!"
Dolly screams, "Oh, hark!"
Jimmy cries, "Oh, stop your chin!"
Gyp begins to bark;
Pussy, too, sets up a yowl,
Molly sings, "Oh, come, love, come!"
Sammy drops the sugar bowl,
Dick warbles, "Home, Sweet Home!"

MAMIE LUKE.

A Pleasant Letter.

As I sit here, too sick to work, too miserable to read, yet not ill enough to go to bed, the thought comes, Why not write a letter to the Children's Corner?

One would naturally suppose it required energy to write for the papers, but in my case this afternoon the lack of energy to try to do anything that might be called work suggested the idea of writing.

I hav been wondering, Where are all the folks who wanted a Children's Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER? and also wondering if they were, like me, too ill and too idle to write.

Surely there are enough who could write interesting articles if they only would.

I feel a little sad. To-day my twenty-three-years-old baby left me for a home of her own. She was married last Thursday to a bright young German farmer, who came this morning with a great two-horse hay-rack loaded with household furniture, and, seating her on top of the heap, drove away, they laughing and waving their hands back at my old face at the window. They would not take me with them, but will come for me as soon as they are settled and the house well aired and warmed. How strangely things come about! She was born in my father's house in another part of this state, and now is married in his house here. The dear grandmother's hands, which were the first to receive the baby form, were folded over the silent breast less than two years since, and the soulless form laid in the village cemetery.

My eldest granddaughter was born in this house, and was here to see Aunty married. The aged grandfather livs, hale and hearty, and for several months there hav been four of us living here, each one representing a generation—the oldest seventy-six, the youngest, seven. When we get together—my father, his children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren—there are twenty-two of us; a happy, jolly, rollicking lot, not a pious one in the crowd.

We let my oldest granddaughter go to the Unitarian Sunday-school when she wants to. One Sunday I said, "Well, Gertrude, what did they ask you to-day?" She thought a moment, and answered, "Oh, nothing much, only who made me." "And what did you answer?" I asked. "Why, I said my mamma made me, but Miss Betty said, 'Oh, no, God made you.'" "And then," said I "what did you tell her?" Quickly came the answer: "Oh, nothing at all. She doesn't know any better, and I didn't want any fuss about it."

She thinks the cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER very interesting. She will come running with the paper and ask, "Oh, grandma, can't I see the pictures first?" then tearing off the wrap, will spread the paper on the lounge, and down on her knees, and study the pictures for half an hour, asking questions about them until she understands them as well as a little seven-year-old girl can. Then she is prepared to instruct her younger cousins. My father thinks the paper a terribly wicked affair, and chides me for allowing her to see so much of it.

Excuse this long, prosy letter. Next time I will try to do better. E. L. HULL.

The Ventriloquist's Dog.

We are often told that an intelligent dog can almost talk. Here is a story of one who actually did talk, or at any rate seemed to do so:

A solemn man recently entered a restaurant, followed by his dog, seated himself, and called for a bill of fare. It was given him.

"What would you like to hav sir?" asked the waiter, flipping the table with his napkin.

The dog, meanwhile, had climbed upon a chair on the other side of the table, and was gravely regarding his master.

"Well," said the solemn man, reflectivly, "gimme some oxtail soup."

"Gimme the same," said the dog.

The waiter's face assumed the color of cold boiled veal.

"Cup o' coffee and plenty of milk," went on the solemn man.

"Gimme the same," said the dog.

The waiter shuddered, and fled for the kitchen.

A man with a squint, at an adjoining table, was much interested in the scene. He had observed it closely, and finally spoke to the solemn man.

"It must be a fearful lot o' work to teach that dog to talk, mister."

"It was," said the solemn man.

"I should think so," said the dog.

"What 'ud you take for him now?" said the man with a squint.

"Wouldn't sell him," said the solemn man.

"You'd better not," said the dog.

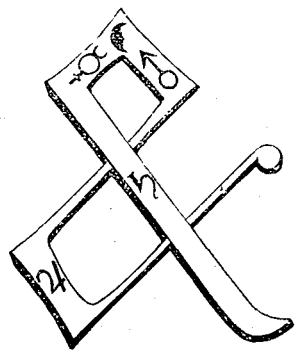
The man with a squint was much impressed. He began making wild offers, and when he reached two hundred dollars the solemn man relented.

"Well," said he, "I can't refuse that. I hate to part with him, but you can hav him."

"He'll be sorry for it," said the dog.

The man with the squint drew a check for the amount, which he gave to the solemn man. The man was about leaving when the dog cried:

"Never mind, I'll get even. I'll never speak again."



He never did.

The gentleman with a squint was proprietor of a show.

The solemn man was a professional ventriloquist.

Correspondence.

SALEM, ILL., Nov. 29, 1886.

TO MISS WIXON AND THE CORNER: Having tried to write once or twice before, I thought I would try again, as I see there are but few letters in the Corner.

I hav read Col. R. G. Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon," and think it is good. I once commenced to memorize his Decoration Day oration, but my memory was not exceedingly good, and I failed.

The cartoon on the first page of the 27th issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER speaks volumes. Only think! what in this wide world has she to thank? As the savior of our country (as I would call him), Mr. Ingersoll, has said, "Man is just as he must be," and, in my opinion, this poor woman is just as the laws of her country hav made her.

My appeal to all the young Liberals of this Corner is to read these "Lay Sermons," for I hope there will be more to read them over and over again—there are millions in them. My poor aged grandfather will not read them because they are in THE TRUTH SEEKER, that paper "noblest and best of all." O ignorance, when wilt thou remove thy iron grasp from off the minds of the people? For these reasons, kind friends, read the gems of thought from wherever they may come, that you may not become such grandparents as mine are. I want you so become men and women that will giv a person credit if he should happen to ascend to the top round of the ladder of knowledge. You may put me down as an Individualist.

Please place this in the Corner, if possible, and oblige, RUFUS O. WILLIAMS.

CALISTOGA, CAL., Nov. 22, 286.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Allow me to say good morning to the friends of the Corner, this being my début among them. I like the Corner very much, and read all of the letters with great interest. Many of the younger writers, even, show a degree of intelligence that an older head might be proud of. While you of the East are sleigh-riding and skating on ice, we of sunny California are wearing our muslins and summer hats. Generally, our coldest weather is about the decline of autumn and the opening days of spring, when the winds blow from off the snows in the North Land and the high Sierras. After the autumn winds, winter, with its warm rains and gentle south winds, steps in and calls the tender grasses and little flowers from their warm beds of fallen leaves. To see wild flowers in January is not a rare thing with us. Our orchards are often white in February, and the hills are green from December to June; after then they gradually turn brown from want of moisture.

The frontispiece in the last TRUTH SEEKER is a good one; but they must not blow too hard, or they'll burst the old thing. The stitches are grinning already, and the material is poor. Yours, for truth,

JESSIE M. WEYBRIGHT.

CALISTOGA, CAL., Nov. 29, 286.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav seen so many letters in the Children's Corner, I thought I would try and write one also. Mr. Heston puts some funny pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER. They wanted some rare animals, but I think they hav got too much of it, especially the monkey, who has both hands over his nose.

Well, this being my first, I guess I will close. Yours, LOUIS V. WEYBRIGHT.

CHAT WITH CORRESPONDENTS.

W. F. PECK.—Your letter will be printed next week. We quite agree with you as to the merits of Miss K., and we wish there were more like her. Thanks for your interest and communication.

C. FANNIE ALLYN.—Glad to hear from you. We never forget old friends. We did enjoy our visit to B. Your name was spoken there with great admiration. "The General" is cute, and will come to the front in print soon. Accept our love and good wishes.

WARREN B. ORCHARD.—Please write puzzles on one side of page only, and leave space between them and the answers.

CORA C. BROWN.—You wish to know if we are soon to write another book for young folks. Of late we hav received several letters of the same import, to which we reply, Yes, just as soon as those we hav already written are sold off, or enough to warrant the outlay of another publication. It costs money to print books, and some Liberals forget to patronize their "own folks." Now that "The Story Hour" is reduced in price, the large edition should be rapidly exhausted.

ESPRIT FORT.—How about the stars? Is astrology the science, after all? and does it forbid the making of puzzles?

ROSE E. PHILLIPS.—You must excuse the editor for not writing to you. She is very busy, and has little time for personal correspondence.

MINNIE DAILEY.—Your letter next week. We are glad you are coming into a broad and liberal atmosphere. Keep on in the path of right and duty, and you need not fear.—ED. C. C.

Poetry.

"Your Miserable Sinner."

Allowing that God is Jesus,
And likewise that Jesus is God.
And both were the children of Mary
In a manner suspiciously odd;
Assuming that truth and religion,
Salvation, damnation, and all
Are one in the absolute knowledge
Of wisdom supreme; that the fall
Of man was a "racket" concocted
By Satan to bother the Lord,
And the cross was a countercheck holy
As good as the times would afford—
Why, I honor an upright Christian
Wherever he may be found,
And think that the world would be better
If he weren't so seldom around.

But there is your "miserable sinner,"
The fellow that likes to tell
How much he is prone to fall forward
And ought to be kicked into hell;
How justice would giv him the devil,
But Mercy she raises her hand
And says, "I can martial the rascal
In a Methodist praying band."
What kind of a born-again system
Of true reformation is that?
What cheap sort of unction is furnished
These gluttons that never get fat?
What ails the undying devotion
That kneels at the blessed cross,
And the more it is tried in the furnace
The drosser becomes the dross?

There's Fisher—he'll get up in meeting
And hav the old story all o'er,
How he is a vagabond straggler,
Polluted way down to the core;
But if one of his neighbors should tell him
That he's a confounded ass
That ought to be given a bridle,
Behold! it would come to pass,
He would rise in his godly anger,
And knock you down, if he could,
For hurting his reputation
And slandering his manhood.

It is all very well to be humble.
And knuckle square in when you're beat,
But logic don't mix with advancement
When reason is on the retreat;
It never will answer to argue
Religion has brought you relief,
And wind up the noble confession
By calling yourself a thief.
Christ wants you to grow in the freedom
Wherewith he hath made you free,
And giv him your hand like a brother,
As though you were shaking with me;
But if your redemption's a failure
And doesn't improve you below,
If you planted your seed by the waters
And found that the seed doesn't grow:
still you're a miserable sinner,
And all his blood hasn't sufficed,
Stop soothing the temples of Satan
By washing the feet of Christ.

Book Notice.

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED. In five lectures. By John R. Kelso. Printed at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, 33 Clinton Place, New York. Price $1.

Colonel Kelso has written several good books, and they are as brave and loyal as he is himself. His latest, bearing the title above, is no less interesting than any that has yet come from his pen.

I never knew, until seeing this book, that its author is a Spiritualist—an honest, candid, and fearless Spiritualist, no one can doubt who is at all familiar with his courage and daring in treating all manner of superstition and intolerance.

I must confess that I was somewhat surprised to know that so cool a destroyer of shams had espoused the cause of Spiritualism, but he assures us it is upon evidence sure and direct that he has become converted, and this is the only correct basis of conversion to that faith.

In the book under consideration, Spiritualism is the client for which he acts as an attorney, and he certainly establishes the fact beyond dispute that his client is all right from a Bible and Christian church standpoint.

But, then, one can prove any ism, any dogma, by the Bible. Communism, Adventism, Mormonism, freeloveism, "come-out-erism," in fact, every distinctiv creed or faith gets a more solid twist from Bible teachings; but perhaps Spiritualism can be clinched a little tighter by the holy scriptures than other forms or phases of philosophy. Surely, one cannot read Colonel Kelso's book without feeling that the Bible proves Spiritualism, if it proves anything; and if reading and believing in the "good book" makes anything of a man it should make him a Spiritualist.

From the view of such a believer Spiritualism must stand sustained, which he will see at once if he reads Colonel Kelso's book, and it should be in the hands of every Christian in the land.

To the hard-headed Materialist, who cannot be convinced of facts by Bible evidence or knock-down arguments of the Christian church, the book will prove of little value, except as an ingenious and well-put premise from one given point.

He demands proof from facts in nature that are beyond dispute. In the chapter on "Spiritual Mediumship," the author says that "in the present life all men are dualistic beings, having one full set of physical organs, physical senses adapted to the material world, and another set of spiritual organs, senses, etc., to bring them into relation with the spiritual world." All this may be, but I hardly think it has been actually proven so to be yet. He further, very candidly, says, "If, in all its phases, Spiritualism cannot bear the tests of reason, science, and common sense, it ought to go down just as all religions founded on the idea of a personal God are bound to whenever they are subjected to these same tests." With this we can all agree, as with many other parts of the book.

Colonel Kelso has all the ardor and sincerity of a recent convert to a philosophy that we all would be glad to know is true. He has not yet investigated the form of Spiritualism known as "materialization." When he has done this, and gone farther into the depths of the mystic faith, I am sure he will hav something more to say upon the subject. In the mean time, "Spiritualism Sustained" should hav a wide circulation, especially among those who still pin their faith upon the Bible, and as the price is only $1, it comes within the reach of all who would like to be enlightened on this matter.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The objectof the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It is unquestionable true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made n the work before us."—N. Y. Sun.

Books for Presents.

This being the time of year when friends bear testimony to their friendship by making presents, we respectfully call the attention of Freethinkers to the following list of books which are eminently fit for Christmas and New Year's presents. At the head of the list stands

PROSE POEMS AND SELECTIONS. By ROBERT G. INGERSOLL. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac-simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9. "Prose Poems" is the book for one heretic to present to another.——But to do good as well as confer pleasure, Liberals can place upon the Christmas table of their Christian friends

INGERSOLL'S LECTURES COMPLETE. Bound in one volume, half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5.——For a present to a Christian lady (and Christian gentlemen can profit by it as well) no book can be more appropriate than MEN, WOMEN, AND GODS. By HELEN H. GARDENER. Introduction by ROBERT G. INGERSOLL. Cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents. This edition is revised and enlarged, and handsomely bound.

The following novels and romances are all Freethought works, inculcating truths, and are handsomely bound:

NATHANIEL VAUGHAN, PRIEST AND MAN. By FREDERIKA MACDONALD. Price $1.25.

MARTYRDOM OF MAN. By WINWOOD READE. Price $1.75.

THE STORY HOUR. For the children. By Miss SUSAN H. WIXON. Price $1.00.

VOLTAIRE'S ROMANCES. Cloth, $2.00; half calf or half morocco, $4.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW. AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

"NOTES ON INGERSOLL."

By B. W. Lacy

A thorough exposure of the Catholic priest's sophistry, unfairness, and historical misstatement.

Price, Cloth, $1; Paper, 50 Cents.

News of the Week.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND has given $50 to the Indian mission school at Santa Fé, N. M.

GRATKAU, the Milwaukee Anarchist, has been arraigned for libeling the court, jury, and witnesses.

THE Rev. Theodore L. Weaver, ex-Methodist, ex-Baptist, revivalist, and temperance orator, is in jail at Elmira for forgery.

THE Chicago magazine, the editorial chair of which Miss Rose Elizabeth Cleveland recently abandoned, is now offered for sale.

MISS MARY JOHNSTON has been appointed clerk of the Congressional library committee She is the first woman appointed to a post under Congress.

HENRY GEORGE lectured in Boston Sunday night. He denied that he had agreed to help Carter Harrison to a reëlection as mayor of Chicago, as has been reported.

IT is reported from the capital that the outlook is not very favorable for a brilliant season. If this is true, something should be done immediately toward stimulating Washington society.

AN order has issued from Archbishop Elder forbidding Roman Catholic vocalists to sing in Protestant churches. There is something glorious about the liberty which Roman Catholics enjoy.

THE financiers say that if Congress does not provide for a heavy reduction of taxes between now and March, serious contraction of the currency is likely to result from the large increase of the treasury surplus.

GENERAL BOOTH, of the Salvation Army, at the head of his cohorts in New York, has been holding all-night hallelujah meetings. The exercises were what might be expected among lunatics. Booth sailed for England on the 11th.

A GANG of tramps attacked a saloon in Shenandoah, Pa., last Saturday night, robbed the till, and nearly killed three men. Nine of them were arrested, and narrowly escaped lynching at the hands of the miners of the place.

SOME robbers went through a train at Bellevue, Texas, on the 11th, taking all the valuables in the possession of the men, but as these had been placed in the hands of the women, only $105 was realized. The highwaymen met with no opposition, although there were armed soldiers on board the train.

THE indictment for adultery against Parson Downs, of Boston, has been dropped, as there was no way of getting the witnesses to appear. Downs preached about his case last Sunday. He endeavored to clear himself, and made charges of a very serious nature against former members of his congregation.

MONSIGNOR CAPEL, the Catholic propagandist, advertises that he has discovered the author of the slanders charging him with immorality, and that he will shortly proceed to prosecute the offender according to law. The slander alluded to is to the effect that the monsignor has been sustaining ministerial relations toward another man's wife.

THE St. Louis clergymen who recently warned the public against attending the performances of the American Opera Company on account of the dangers to morality thereby incurred hav received an invitation from the managers of the company to come and see the ballet dance which they condemn. How many of the ministers accepted the invitation is not known.

THE workingmen are holding a fair at 20 Astor Place, this city, to raise money to buy the Leader a press. The Leader is a labor daily started during the recent campaign. Many attractiv things are offered at the fair, and all sorts of devices to relieve him of his spare change are sprung upon the unwary male visitor by ladies of the association. It is a pleasant place to spend an hour, and the money it costs goes to the support of a good cause.

SIX years ago the Rev. Father Murphy, a Catholic priest in charge of a parish near Elmira, N. Y., fell from grace and was removed. His lapse from virtue was attributed to overstudy. He is now in the Massachusetts state Reformatory, having been found guilty of fraud. Lately a forged check for $500 drawn by Father Murphy has turned up in Elmira. When the Massachusetts authorities are done with the Rev. Mr. Murphy, the bankers of Elmira will take him in hand.

Gems of Thought.

WHILE the pagan religions of the Eastern world were pursuing the even tenor of their way, killing none because they did not believe as they did, Christians were saturating the earth with the blood of its children, and doing all in their power to force back the incentivs to science, education, and a better civilization.—D. M. Bennett.

MILL spoke tenderly and reverently of the personal character of the founder of Christianity, and on this part of the subject he wrote as if he was confident that Carlyle agreed with him. But below the truth of any particular religion there lay harder problem of the existence and providence of God; and here it seemed that Carlyle had a positiv faith, while Mill had no more than a sense of probability. Carlyle admitted that, so far as external evidence went, the being of God was a supposition inadequately proved. The grounds of certainty which Carlyle found in himself Mill, much as he desired to show Carlyle's belief, confessed that he was unable to recognize. So again with the soul. There was no proof that it perished with the body, but again there was no proof that it did not.—Froude's Life of Carlyle.

MILTON was resolute in his religion at Rome, so much so that many were deterred from showing him the civilities they were prepared to offer. His rule, he says, was "not of my own accord to introduce in those places conversation about religion, but, if interrogated respecting the faith, then, whatsoever I should suffer, to dissemble nothing. What I was, if any one asked, I concealed from no one; if any one in the very city of the pope attacked the orthodox religion, I defended it most freely." Beyond the statement that the English Jesuits were indignant, we hear of no evil consequences of this imprudence. Perhaps the Jesuits saw that Milton was of the stuff that would welcome martyrdom, and were sick of the affair of Galileo, which had terribly damaged the pretensions of their church.—Mark Pattison's Milton.

THE bishops of Constantine's time were all of them ignorant and superstitious men, but they could not all of them think alike. And, as if to insure dissent, they proceeded to define that which had never existed, and which, if it had existed, could never be defined. They described the topography of heaven. They dissected the godhead and expounded the immaculate conception, giving lectures on celestial impregnations and miraculous obstetrics. They not only said that there was one and that one was three, they professed to explain how that curious arithmetical combination had been brought about. The indivisible had been divided; it was divisible and yet it was indivisible; black was white and white was black, and yet there were not two colors, but one color; and whoever did not believe this would be damned, and "without doubt perish everlastingly."—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

THE work indeed of a gentleman is not so gross, but it may be as smart and painful as any other. For all hard work is not manual; there are other instruments of action beside the plow, the spade, the hammer, the shuttle; nor doth every work produce sweat and tiring of body; the head may work hard in contrivance of good designs, the tongue may be very activ in dispensing advice, persuasion, comfort, and edification in virtue; a man may bestir himself in "going about to do good;" these are works employing the cleanly industry of a gentleman.—Dr. Isaac Barrow.

WE ought to adjust our minds to any fate. If we receive a further gift of life, we shall be thankful. If we do not, let us be thankful for what we hav received; and since our existence does not depend on ourselvs, let us consider those things that will tend to our present happiness and prosperity. If we hav no faith in a future life, let us use this life wisely and well, and leave it, when our time comes, uncomplainingly.—L. K. Washburn.

AN honest man here lies at rest,
As e'er God with his image blest;
The friend of man, the friend of truth,
The friend of age, the friend of youth.
Few hearts like his, with virtue warmed,
Few heads with knowledge so informed;
If there's another world he livs in bliss,
If there is none, he made the best of this.
—Burns's Epitaph on a Friend.

THE assertion of the motion of the earth was a defiance not only of philosophy and the church, but, at the same time of that common ignorance which passes by the name of common sense, and physical science threw down her glove by the hand of Galileo. It is not pleasant to think of the immediate result of the combat; to see the champion of science, old, worn, and on his knees before the cardinal inquisitor, signing his name to what he knew to be a lie. And, no doubt, the cardiuals rubbed their hands as they thought how well they had silenced and discredited their adversary. But two hundred years hav passed, and however feeble or faulty her soldiers, physical science sits crowned and enthroned as one of the legitimate rulers of the world of thought. Charity children would now be ashamed not to know that the earth moves, while the school-men are forgotten; and the cardinals—well, the cardinals are at the Ecumenical Council (1870), still at their old business of trying to stop the movement of the world. —Huxley's Lay Sermons.

IN so far as Christ taught any doctrin in opposition to slavery, in favor of intellectual liberty, upholding kindness, enforcing the practice of justice and mercy, I most cheerfully admit that his teaching should be followed. Such teachings do not need the assistance of miracles. They are not in the region of the supernatural. They find their evidence in the glad response of every honest heart that superstition has not touched and stained.—R. G. Ingersoll.

SINCE the generality of persons act from impulse more than from principle, men are neither so good nor so bad as we are apt to think them.—Hare's Guesses at Truth.

Odds and Ends.

WAS the word he-ll changed to she-ol with a view toward obtaining the correct gender?

WHY is it the lowest scandals seem to obtain among people who liv in the highest circles?

"ALL flesh is grass," they say, but how about a wooden-headed man with a marble brow, an iron will, and a stony heart? Go to, and if you can't go two, go one.

MRS. CANDIDATE: "Oh, I'm so glad the election is over, even if you are beaten." Mr. Candidate: "Why, my love?" Mrs. Candidate: "Because, now I can tell the butcher just what I think of him for sending us tough steak without fear of his voting against you."

"Is there a colored man around here who can beat a carpet?" asked a citizen of a whitewasher at the market yesterday. "I reckon dat pusson ober dar' kin do it, sah." "Is he a professional?' "Yes, sah. He's beat two groceries, three saloons, and his wife, an' I reckon he kin git away wid a ca'pet."

"HAV you finished your sermon, dear?" asked the wife of one of the Brooklyn divines. "Sermon be blanked!" was the reply; "how in blazes do you suppose I'm going to write sermons? This is another reply to the four hundred and forty-fourth chapter of charges in the twelfth case. Nice chance I hav to write sermons!"

CATHARINE OWEN has published a book called "Ten Dollars Enough." She may think so now, but by the time she gets all the jet trimming, and stuff for the overskirt, she will find that about ten dollars more is necessary, not including the dressmaker's bill. Ten dollars is enough for the material, but the trimming and making cost like sixty.

"CONDUCTOR," said a solemn-visaged man, "do you appreciate how precarious your business is? Do you realize that in the midst of life we are in death, and that at any moment this train may take us all to eternity?" "This train won't take anybody to eternity," replied the conductor, "because there's no such station on this line."

HER ANSWER.

On my left there was little May Belle
Who is always so sparkling and jolly,
And who likes me, I fancy, quite well.

The former spoke somehow of ages;
"Now, what would you take me to be?"
I asked. She replied, "Of life's pages
I suppose you hav turned twenty-three."

Miss B-lle, on my left, was abstracted,
And did not our words overhear,
Nor knew she the answer expected
As I whispered quite low in her ear,

"And what would you take me for, Mary?"
And then this small maiden perverse,
From out of abstraction, quite weary,
Responded,—"For better or worse."

T. M. HORNE.

"YOU ought to join the church," said Deacon Pusher to another board of trade man the other day. "I know it, deacon, and I hav been feeling as though I would like to do it for a good spell back." "Then why the mischief don't you do it!" said the deacon, as he made a memorandum to crowd Mickum to the wall at the first favorable opportunity. "There is one serious obstacle in the way." "And what the Old Harry might that be?" "Well, the fact is, I am not religious—I hav no religion at all." "Well, that is not at all necessary, my dear sir—not necessary at all. Humph! the idea!" "But, deacon, my convictions—" "Convictions be hanged! What do we care for convictions? All we want is pew rent."

SPIRITUALISM Sustained By the Bible

BY COL. JOHN R. KELSO.

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

IT is a burlesque on justice to refer to twelve opinionless fools as a jury of one's peers.—Martha's Vineyard Herald.

A BOSTON paper boasts that there was not a single arrest in that city Sunday. Evidently, says a Western paper, the Boston police are a pious lot and don't work Sunday.

A YOUNG Tunker in Wayne county, Pa., on one occasion announced that he would read for the morning's lesson "Pislam Siv." After reading awhile it flashed upon the congregation that he meant Psalm civ.

SAYS Sam Jones: "I would rather preach the funeral of one gambler who was generous than the funeral of one hundred Methodists who were stingy. An old skin flint! What could a fellow do at a funeral like that?"

IF you are poor, there is one consolation—your heirs will not go into court to prove that you were an imbecil during your childhood, an idiot at the time of your marriage, and a gibbering lunatic for years before you died.—Ex.

A CHICAGO Presbyterian clergyman astonished his congregation the other morning while reading from the Bible. He was reading the account of the creation, and turned over two leaves instead of one immediately after the words, "So God made woman." The words which he then read were, "And he made it out of gopher wood; fifteen cubits long he made it, and it was pitched within and without." The parson had skipped from the creation of Eve to the building of the ark. This is the story as the Chicago Herald tells it. It would be more probable if the sentences quoted could be found in the Bible, but they can't.

WE believe in electing women to public office, and are glad to see that voters generally are willing to accord that privilege to the weaker sex. But we notice that they generally get the office that has no salary attached.—Boston Post.

SCENE at Harvard College: Junior (translating New Testament): "And the an'—and the Lord said, Lord said unto—unto Moses." Here he hesitated and looked appealingly to a neighbor, who being also unprepared, whispered, "Skip it." Junior (going on): "And the Lord said unto Moses, skip it." Great consternation ensued.—Texas Siftings.

"MY dear friend," said a minister at the bedside of a sick man, "I want to call your attention to the blessed consolation which religion brings in hours of suffering and danger——" "I'm much obliged to you," interposed the grateful patient, "but you are too late." "Too late?" "Yes, sir; my physician says that the crisis is past, and all danger is over."

A BOSTON philanthropist and student of human nature bought a dozen cheap umbrellas, had a nickel-plate inserted in each handle on which was his address, and the request that the umbrella be returned, and on the first rainy day went out on the street and handed one to each umbrellaless woman that he met. All were returned within a week, but one, and in place of that came a note saying that it had been stolen, and that the writer would pay for it. The next rainy day he handed the umbrellas to twelve unprotected men. He never saw but one of them again, and that was brought in by a friend who said that he had stolen it at a church festival.

A PORTLAND Chinaman wrote the following note to a lady who wanted to engage a cook: "Mrs Lady, FRIEND SHE: You when at there told to me want to boy cooking. I wish could take him to stay with you and Leong Gitt recommend to him come to she."

ARE the Hebrew youth degenerating? It would seem so from the American Hebrew's view of it: "The oppressor against whom the young Israelites of our day must take manful stand is the great tyrant, Indifference. He it is who desecrates our temples and holy days; he it is who forbids the observance of the Law. It is he who sets up the heathen idols of Mammon, Society, and Ostentation. It is he who places forbidden food on the altars of our homes. And what of the women of Israel of to-day? Alas! the pity and the shame of it! They do not shine resplendently beside those of the past."

THE Roman Catholic press has been triumphantly announcing the news of the baptism of Manlio Garabaldi. The vaunted conversion, says the London Freethinker, turns out to be a pure invention. The widow of Garibaldi writes to the editor of the Turin Gazette, contradicting the "scandal." She says, "No such baptism has taken place, nor ever will take place, because we are all determined to hold the traditions of the family intact, and to respect the will of my ever-to-be-deplored husband." Most of the ordinary Italian journals refused to insert the report, the strong anti-clerical opinion of the Garibaldis being too well known to allow of belief in the genuinness of the pious fabrication.

AT a recent meeting of clergymen in San Francisco declarations were made in favor of freeing churches from taxation. The San Francisco Star says: "The doctrin that church or ecclesiastical property should be exempt from taxation is wrong in itself and a mistake in policy besides. The great head of the Christian church, by a most striking declaration, placed himself on record as a taxable under the Roman empire. If the Christian church desires to enforce honesty in the public, it will not begin by avoiding to pay taxes. No matter how unaffectedly pious its motivs may be, its example will be a million times weightier. 'If the church escapes taxation, I will escape. If I am not strong enough to escape by means of a law, I will escape any way I can.' Right or wrong, such is the way in which the example will be used. Moreover, if church property does not pay, all secular property must pay for it, and thus we shall hav the largest denomination worshiping God at the expense of everybody else. No such scalping Christianity as that will command the respect of the public at large, nor should it. Pay up, gentlemen of the churches. You may not be able to find the amount of your church property tax in a fish, but you can in your pockets. Take thence the money, giv it to your financial officer, and say, 'That take, and giv unto them for thee and me.'"

Communications.

Ireland and the Papacy.

In one of my letters to "D. C.," published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, March 27th, I said: "You, my friend, the son of an Irishman, should not be ignorant of the history of your own people. Once they were free, happy, prosperous; and their manufactures, world-renowned, made your little island one of the richest on the globe. The arts and sciences flourished, and the many institutions of learning made Ireland the pride of Christendom. But Pope Adrian IV. changed all this, for, in 1155, he presented her to Henry II., and one of his successors indorsed the gift by re-deeding her to Queen Mary, wife of Philip. For hundreds of years your once happy country was the scene of outrages almost unparalleled in history, and to-day Protestant England lords it over Catholic Ireland, and points to your infallible pope as the prime cause." I deemed it unnecessary to go further into details, presuming these facts to be well known to the reading world. They were intended as a gentle hint to "D. C.," to refresh his memory on the early history of his nativ country, as he is not only an ardent Catholic, but an enthusiastic Irishman, and I did not see how he could consistently entertain loyalty to Rome and Ireland at the same time. But a few weeks after the publication of the letter I noticed that Brother Macdonald had to substantiate my assertions, so I determined to write the matter up more in detail, and deciding it would be better to submit the original document, I had, of necessity, to wait till it was obtainable.

The deeding of Ireland to the English brings in with it what is known as the "Donation of Constantine," as found in the "Decretals." These "Decretals" were a collection of the supposed decisions of the various church councils, from the second century up to their first exhibit at the synod of Chiersy, in 857, and covered every disputed point that the formulators could possibly conceive. They were used by the popes to extend their power over the other bishops, and centralize at Rome.

As language changes very materially in even one hundred years, it has been shown, from the peculiar terms used, that the "Decretals" were compiled not earlier than 800. The legends they contain are, in the main, false. One will suffice to show this point—that of Pope Marcellinus.

It states that during the persecution of Diocletian, this pope was induced to sacrifice to the Roman gods. On receipt of the news, three hundred bishops held a council at Sinuessa, but decided that as Marcellinus was the supreme head of the church, he could be judged by no man. The pope admitted his guilt, and pronounced his own deposition on Aug. 23, 303.

This legend was admitted into the Roman breviary as late as the sixteenth century, to inculcate the principle that, as the clergy could not depose the pope, the laity could neither judge nor interfere with the clergy. In his contest with Sylvester, Pope Symmachus utilized it, as did also Xystus III., when he was accused of unchastity.

Catholic historians now admit that no such council as that of Sinuessa was ever held. But the "Decretals" answered the purpose for which they were written, and for centuries the popes rode triumphantly over the people by proudly pointing to these forgeries as evidences of their spiritual and temporal authority. The exposure did not cause Rome to relinquish her claims, and, as I propose to show, in the deeding away of Ireland she acted as she even now claims the right to act—the disposition is good; the power only is wanting. She claims everything, here and hereafter.

In 1558, Pope Paul IV. issued his bull, Cum ex Apostolatus Officio, and in order that there might be no question as to its having come direct from God, attached it, according to the ancient custom, to the door of St. Peter's church. Many theologians held, and I believe still hold, that in order to make these documents authoritativ, they must go through this ceremony. The bull contains these three propositions:

1. The pope, who is Pontifex Maximus, is God's representativ on earth; has full authority and power over all nations and kingdoms; he judges all, and can, in this world, be judged by none.

2. All rulers, as well as bishops, as soon as they become tainted with heresy or schism, are irrevocably deposed without need of any legal formality; deprived forever of all right of government, and incur sentence of death. In case of repentance, they are to be imprisoned in a monastery and do penance on bread and water for the remainder of their lives.

3. None may giv aid to a heretical or schismatical prince, not even the mere services of common humanity. Any monarch who does so forfeits his dominions, which lapse to princes obedient to the holy see.

Pius V. in his examination of this bull expressly confirms and renews it. It was also affirmed in the 23d proposition of the syllabus of Pius IX., Dec. 8, 1864.

Having thus determined her universal sovereignty and, of necessity, her superiority to all laws, it follows, as a natural sequence, that the holy father is at liberty to enter into any obligation and break it at his own sweet pleasure. So, in 1215, Innocent III. issued from the council of Lateran the manifesto that "oaths contrary to the interests of the church and to the precepts of the holy fathers are not oaths, but perjuries."

Incidental to this was the absolving of Christian princes from their oaths with non-Christian powers; possibly the most glaring one being the breaking of the treaty with the Moors of Grenada on the pretext that "an oath to an Infidel is not binding on a Christian."

The Univers of July 22, 1871, speaking on this subject, says: "The concordats between Rome and civil states are not contracts, but temporary privileges, which the pope deigns to grant according to circumstances; mere concessions of which he always remains the master and sole judge, and which he can revoke at pleasure."

The Civilta Cattolica, created into a Jesuit corporation by Pius IX. and recognized as the papal official organ, on March 18, 1871, page 664, says: "The pope is sovereign judge over all civil laws. In him the two authorities, the temporal authority and the civil authority, are united, for he is the vicar of Jesus Christ, who was not only the eternal priest, but the king of kings and lord of lords. The pope, by virtue of his exalted dignity, is at the summit of the two powers."

Even Brother Capel, who, by the way, is now in California, attending to the spiritual—let us hope not temporal—wants of a rich and pretty widow, in the London Times of Jan. 18, 1875, wrote: "The church, as representativ of the spiritual power, and as the guardian of the divine law, can define the limits of her own powers, and consequently, ipso facto, those of the other powers [the civil]."

As Rome owns everything, can make and break contracts at pleasure, it follows that everyone must think just as she does; so, in his Encyclical Letter, Gregory XVI. calls liberty of conscience "an absurd maxim, an idle dream," and his prime minister, Cardinal Pacca, wrote: "If under certain circumstances prudence demands their toleration [liberty of conscience and freedom of the press], as one tolerates a lesser evil to avoid a greater, such doctrin never can be presented by a Roman Catholic as a good or desirable thing." This doctrin was strenuously upheld in all Catholic countries, and this letter of Gregory XVI. was only called forth on account of the action of various Catholic states in regard to what was known as the "Ecclesiastical Court."

In olden times this "Court" was in full sway. By an express provision of the canonical law, a layman was not a competent witness in a criminal suit against a clergyman. In other words, if a cleric debauched a woman and was discovered by the husband or brother, their testimony would be inadmissible; and the woman, having no standing in court, could not testify. But, even if a felon, a layman could testify in support of wills made in favor of pious objects. When the Spaniards conquered Mexico, Peru, and adjacent countries, this "Court" was instituted, and held to be perfectly legal. Foreigners began to crowd in, and the nativ estimation of the priestly character underwent a change. New Grenada passed a law for the protection of her daughters, and only asked that when a criminal charge was pending against a priest, he should suspend the exercise of his spiritual functions.

But Pius IX., on Sept. 27, 1852, in his allocution, Acerbissimum, placed the whole country under ban. On Dec. 15, 1856, he treated Mexico likewise, for daring to say she had rights which the papacy was bound to respect. Failing to carry his point, the expedition of Maximilian was started, and a widowed, heartbroken, and insane wife is all that now remains of it—a monument to papal greed.

It is a fair proposition that if A owns everything, and if B, even after working sixteen hours a day, should manage to accumulate a competency, the competency belongs to A. This, I believe, no lawyer will deny. So, in 1866, Pope Pius IX., who owned everything, issued his Bolla di Composizione, which pardons what we Infidels would call a thief or a gambler, provided he donate a certain portion (about three per cent) of his ill-gotten gains to pious purposes; and, as the document reads, "he may keep and possess the remainder in good faith, as his own property, justly earned and acquired," provided he be unacquainted with the party from whom he stole. I hav no doubt that your Catholic "boodle aldermen" had this Bolla in view when they made their steal. Three per cent would buy a very handsome stained glass window for some church. I would recommend for the next the legend of their savior discoursing on what belonged to God and Cæsar.

Owning the whole earth, Rome must of necessity hav engrafted on her system many things which appealed to the feelings of her various popes. She gathers, but never distributes. She relies on the past; the theory of evolution, of any change, has no place in her memory. Founded at a time when slavery was a universal custom, it has become one of her strongholds. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was promptly placed on the list of prohibited books, because it was opposed to that "divine institution." Montalembert admits the persistent hostility of Pius IX. during our late civil war, and it is an open secret that had it not been for the uncompromising loyalty of the late Archbishop Hughes, who was a confidential adviser and warm personal friend of both Lincoln and Seward, Rome would hav arrayed herself on the side of the South. Of the following incident I hav a personal knowledge.

A relativ of the late Cardinal McCloskey, then archbishop of Albany, was caught spying in Washington. Hughes persistently refused to utilize his friendship with Lincoln to obtain his release. Church influence was brought to bear upon him, but he answered, "The Union first, friendship afterward." The spy was eventually released, but loyalty to the Union, and hatred of slavery, deprived the greatest Catholic ecclesiastic of this age of the cardinalate. But slavery is fast passing away, and let us hope that the pope may depart with her.

If it were not for Rome, many of the relics of a barbarous age would hav passed completely from sight and been known to us only through the pages of history. The emasculation of male attendants is considered by the Turk to be the only security for his harem, and Rome has engrafted this on her system. There is a law which expressly prohibits women singing in the presence of the holy father. Whence, then, those female voices in the papal choir? The poor son of peasant parents, showing a natural gift for song, is emasculated, carried to the pope's choir, and his youthful voice utilized in singing songs in praise of a deity whose earthly representativ has so foully debauched him.

I hav gone into details possibly more fully than was necessary, certainly more fully than I had originally intended; but I desired to trace the actions and claims of Rome, up to date. None can reasonably dispute the authenticity of the documents quoted, and as the holy church insists that every claim she indulges in to-day was indulged in by the first pope, the inference is obvious.

As stated before, the "Donation of Constantine" is to be found in the "Decretals." It purported being a gift from Constantine to Pope Sylvester, of the city of Rome, the late Papal States, and other undefined portions of the earth, which, owing to the geographical ignorance of the forger, were mentioned in rather ambiguous language. It read as follows:

> We donate as a free gift to our most blessed father, Sylvester the pope, the city of Rome and the cities of all Italy, as well as the cities of the other Western countries. To make room for him, we abdicate our sovereignty over all these provinces and we withdraw from Rome, transferring the seat of our empire to Byzantium, since it is not just that a terrestrial empire should exist where God has placed the head of religion.

As it was necessary to giv a reason for such a munificent gift, of what he did not own, it was stated that Constantine had been struck by leprosy. The pagan priests assured him that the only cure was to take a bath in the fresh blood of infants. But the tender heart of this noble emperor—who had already committed seven murders, and among them his wife and son—could not resist the appeals of the mothers of the selected infants, and he heroically concluded to sacrifice himself by refusing his only means of cure. The good God, who had only been experimenting with him as he had been in yore with Job, rewarded his noble purpose by a vision in which he was told to apply to Pope Sylvester. This he did, was cured, baptized, and in return presented his benefactor with other peoples' property, not to mention certain continents hitherto undiscovered.

The three great authorities always quoted in regard to the fourth century—"Historia Tripartita," and the chronicles of Jerome and Isidore—are silent on the subject of this gift. In fact, Eusebius directly contradicts it, for he states emphatically that he himself (if my memory serves me) baptized Constantine on his dying bed. As Eusebius was, if not a pronounced Arian, at least deeply imbued with the principles of that sect, it is hardly possible that the emperor would hav selected him for his confessor, and then rewarded Rome, the avowed enemy of Arianism.

It is questionable when the "donation" was first utilized. It is said that Pope Gelasius (492) made mention of it, and it is also stated that Adrian I. quoted it to Charlemagne when that barbarian was claiming the whole earth. If either did mention it, it was merely as a legend; they exhibited no document. A variety of accounts were rife, each differing from the others on some vital point, and there seemed to be no common ground on which all could stand, till the appearance of the document in the latter part of the ninth century.

Beyond the document itself, which was claimed to be in the Lateran church, there is nothing commemorativ of the gift. Rome, so prolific of monuments, a city wherein a cathedral would be raised in honor of the toe-nail of some alleged martyr, contains nothing but a Zophoros in the Lateran Basilica to remind the world of a gift, which, if ever made, and legal, raised the holy father from penury to wealth. Even the costumes on this Zophoros show it was not produced earlier than the twelfth century.

In regard to the legality of the donation, even admitting all the church claims, there can be no argument. A Roman emperor was elected to his office, and "could only enlarge, not diminish, the empire." But the church was ingenious in her arguments. "Constantine was the spiritual son of Sylvester, by baptism," and therefore the pope was his spiritual heir. As all good Christians admit, and the church teaches, that the spiritual is above the temporal, and as the spiritual contains within itself the temporal, being his spiritual heir, the pope, of necessity, was his temporal heir. In fact, there was in reality no necessity for the "donation." The spiritual act of baptism included the temporal act of the donation.

Christendom accepted this definition, and the people prayed and payed, while the clerics preyed and played. Nothwithstanding this general acceptance, the church always took care, and I believe takes care to-day, to hav a secular document properly executed and filed whenever she buys a piece of property.

Nine hundred years ago it was the current belief that the year 1000 would see the end of the world. The precursors to our present Salvation Army marched through the land proclaiming that as the end was nigh, they were prepared to "follow Jesus anywhere, everywhere," and the Moody and Sankey of that day sang "Hold the Fort," without the "General Corse" addendum. The people were so awakened to a realization of the inutility of further holding temporal possessions, which were so soon to be burnt up, that they donated them to the church. Hundreds of noble families in England, notwithstanding the fact that their land already belonged to Rome, deeded it to the church. Then the good God repented, the earth was saved, and the church enjoyed her temporalities till the time of Henry VIII., when, on being called upon to show her title, she exhibited, not the "donation," but the deeds forced from a credulous people, made weakly superstitious by her teachings.

As it will be necessary to select some history of Ireland as a guide, I hav chosen that by Thomas D'Arcy McGee, for the following reasons. He was an uncompromising Irishman and a faithful compiler of facts. Moreover, his work is published by D. & J. Sadlier, of New York, who, as publishers of the Tablet, the official organ of the late cardinal, are equally uncompromising as Catholics, and would not, under any circumstances, publish anything derogatory to the church.

I propose gleaning most of my facts from McGee.

The position of Ireland in the intellectual world was that of a leader; she would remind one of the position of Moorish Grenada prior to her destruction by Ferdinand the Catholic; the center of attraction for men of letters. In speaking of this, McGee says: "The intellectual leadership of Western Europe, the glorious ambition of the greatest nations, has been in turn obtained by Italy, France, Britain, and Germany. From the middle of the sixth to the middle of the eighth century, it will hardly be disputed that that leadership devolved on Ireland. . . . The number of her schools, and the wisdom, energy, and zeal of her masters, retained for her that proud distinction for two hundred years."

Every province had its university, with numerous smaller schools, which were conducted on a more liberal scale than our free schools. "They derived their maintenance, not from taxing the pupils, but in the first instance from public endowments. They were essentially free schools; not only free as to the lessons given, but the venerable Bede tells us they supplied free bed and board and books to those who resorted to them from abroad." It is claimed that the students at these universities numbered one, two, three, and in one instance as many as seven thousand. Europe was flooded with their graduates, and so highly were they esteemed that being able to point to one of them as his Alma Mater was almost a sure guarantee for obtaining a position in a foreign college. The chronicles of the times are filled with the names of Ireland's illustrious sons who carved their way to fortune in foreign lands.

McGee says further: "When we remember that all the books were MSS., that even paper had not yet been invented, that the best parchment was equal to so much beaten gold, and a perfect MS. was worth a king's ransom, we may better estimate the difficulties in the way of the scholar of the seventh century. This is so, for a dispute over a MS. led to a war known as "the Battle of the Book."

About 1153, Dermott Macmorrough, king of Leinster, a man notorious for his gross immorality, abducted the wife of Ororic, prince of Breffney. Various chieftains espoused the cause of Ororic, and Macmorrough was driven from the island. He took refuge in England and swore fealty to Henry II. Captivated by the glowing accounts given him of the country, Henry sent John of Salisbury to Rome to ask the concurrence of the pope to his proposed invasion of Ireland.

The papal chair was then occupied by Nicholas Breakspeare, an Englishman, under title of Adrian IV., who had made his way to Rome a few years before, and by his astuteness had succeeded in mounting it. Historians differ as to the methods used.

On the representations of the English ambassador, Adrian donated Ireland to Henry, writing him a letter to that effect, and, as it was customary in those days to send a token, forwarded the English king a gold ring set with an emerald.

I do not propose quoting the entire letter, only the salient points. It was addressed:

Adrianus Papa gratum et acceptum habet quod Henricus Rex Angliae Insulam Hyberniam ingrediatur ut populum illum legibus subdat, ita tamen ut annua Petro solvatur pensio.

He then cooly authorizes Henry to invade Ireland "in order to extirpate the vice and wickedness of the nativs," "to oblige them to pay yearly from every house one denarius [about one penny] to the see of Rome," givs him "entire authority over the island," commands "all the inhabitants to obey him as sovereign," and invests him with the "fullest powers, all for the glory of God and the salvation of the souls of men."

The monetary part of the transaction is as follows:

Et de singulis domibus annuam unius denarii beato Petri velle solvere pensionem.

And again:

Jure nimirum Ecclesiarum illibato et integro permanente, et salva beato Petro et sacrosanctae Romanae ecclesiae de singulis domibus annua unias denarii pensione.

Richard, earl of Strigul, surnamed Strongbow, undertook the task of conquering the island, and, assisted by Maurice Fitzgerald and Robert Fitzstephen, two Welsh nobleman, and a horde of Flemish, Welsh, and Cornish archers, and numerous men-at-arms, landed on the Irish coast. McARTHUR.

Colonel Ingersoll's Humanity.

Colonel Ingersoll's speeches are always full of salvation for humanity, but his late "Lay Sermon," to me, surpasses all his previous public utterances for its humane and sympathetic spirit, and his disposition to help the oppressed, robbed, and enslaved toiler and wealth-producer. I wish that sermon could be proclaimed from every pulpit and rostrum in the civilized (?) world. I wish every man who calls himself a Liberal, Freethinker, or humanitarian to ponder, and apply to himself, the noble, manly, humane spirit and purpose of that timely and much-needed speech. It answers the question, "What shall we do to be saved?" It directly or impliedly condemns the inhuman, orthodox laws and customs of government and society, which rob man of his natural right to land and the products of his labor. He shows his great goodness and philanthropy when he acknowledges that his having owned much land was wrong in principle and incompatible with the spirit and purpose of the Secular Union and all true progress. He virtually and truly tells us that land, like all other elements and matter not the result of human labor, is the free and unbought inheritance of everyone on earth, to use, but not buy or sell or monopolize. He struck the keynote of the significance of life and how to make the most of it for ourselvs and others by dealing justly with all, by helping to supply all human wants, and each one earning his own living and ceasing to liv on the labor of others.

What a truthful and comprehensiv proposition he stated: "If nobody has too much, everybody will hav enough!" That proposition condemns the present barbarous and predatory practices of society as much as any Nihilist, Socialist, or Communist does. He says: "This is no country for Anarchy, for we hav free speech." But that is a question. Hav we free speech? No; I think we are as far from having free speech as we are from having justice done to labor. The brilliant and inspiring Ingersoll would impress—and so would I—upon all minds that the chief and only object of human life is to be happy and help others to be happy, and that to do this we must cease this grasping selfishness—this "me and mine" spirit—this appropriating to our own use and possession what by nature and justice belongs to others. That "Lay Sermon" as a whole is the most important and practical one that was ever preached at a Liberal convention, for it tells Liberals what they must do, and how they must liv, and that no one can be fully happy while one human being is treated unjustly, and his or her wants unsupplied. Oh, what a scene does our Christian civilization present to the mind sensitiv to right and justice! No true, humane Liberal and Freethinker can for a moment uphold the legal robbing and iniquities everywhere practiced, and the spirit of greed, which, as the colonel says, would, if possible, bottle the air and make people pay for breathing. Let each Liberal who owns much more land than he should, or who is living on high rents or rates of interest, which makes some brother a slave to earn, seriously ponder the truths uttered by Colonel Ingersoll, and resolve that he will, as far as possible, be a true, practical reformer and humanitarian. The time has come when the test of a true man, a true reformer, a true Infidel to orthodoxy, is, How much humanity is there in him or her? how much does he do to help his fellow-man, to relieve his wants and make him happy? This should be, and in time will be, the test of all human opinions, theories, and institutions. Colonel Ingersoll closes his great, unsurpassed sermon by declaring that while he livs he is going to do all he can for his fellow-man. What a happy world we shall hav when every man and woman with the same spirit and feeling makes the same resolve! Long liv that eloquent tongue to plead the cause of humanity!

Missions.

Henry M. Stanley, the African explorer, is in town, lecturing. Last week the Methodist ministers invited him to answer them some questions. One of them was as to the personal safety on the Congo of strangers, and another was as to the dangers to missionaries. In reply, Mr. Stanley said that strangers were safe if they behaved themselvs, and missionaries were all right when they were honest. He related several incidents where missionaries had cheated the nativs in trading, and said that most of the hardships of missionaries were the result of their dishonesty.

There is no greater fraud in the church than this mission fraud, and probably Stanley could, if he would, disclose a great deal. Whether in Africa or India, the Christian missions are colossal swindles. In Saladin's "God and His Book," he has extracted from numerous books evidence sufficient, if generally known, to reduce the contributions to the Methodist million for missions among honest folks. The following quotations, says Saladin, I beg to bring most respectfully under the notice of all such as believe that the gospel of Christ shall yet cover the whole earth:

"I was told that all the Khitmutargs in Calcutta were Christians. I was surprised to hear this, and asked him to what church they belonged. 'Oh, sir,' he replied, 'they do not belong to any church; but they will eat pork and drink brandy'" (Minturn's New York to Delhi).

"The London committee concealed the report of the Madras committee, lest the subscriptions should be withdrawn from so hopeless an enterprise" (India and the Gospel, Clarkson, sec. 5).

"He attributed the exaggerated accounts of conversions to the necessity of creating a sensation at home [in England] at public meetings, in order to raise money" (Six Years in India, vol. i, chap. 2).

"The custom of paying Hindoo converts is so universal that the slightest success in Hindoostan would eat up the revenues of the East India Company" (Edinburgh Review, vol. xii).

"An inquiry made some years ago at Bangalore by a deputation from England resulted in the discovery that the converts and their families were nearly all of them stipendiaries of the mission" (Way to Lose India).

"The whole of them are rescued from poverty, and procure a comfortable subsistence by their conversion" (Observ. on Pres. State).

"The influence of the English missions is an absolute nullity; they reckon no other proselytes than orphans, whom the missionaries purchase, and who, when they grow up, all return to the religion of their countrymen" (L'Inde Aug., vol. iii).

"I hav reason to believe that converts hav in some cases been again and again baptized by the same minister to swell the number of candidates, and induce the belief that the work of conversion was steadily advancing" (Land of the Veda, chap. xvii).

"The preachers hav sometimes [in Ceylon] baptized two or three hundred infants and elder children at a time (they are paid in proportion to the number); indeed, almost all the Buddhist priests in the maritim provinces are persons who hav been baptized in their infancy" (Campbell's Recoll., chap. vii).

"With respect to the baptism of converts in Jerusalem, it is, as far as I know, framed to an accommodation with the most modern Judaism. Six thousand piastres (£50) are offered to the convert as a premium; other advantages are said likewise to be considerable" (Tischendorf, Trans.).

"As they could not make converts at Jerusalem, Protestant Jews were brought hither at the expense of English missionary societies. The process was costly; it is estimated that each has cost the mission about £4,500" (Taylor's Lands of the Saracen, chap. v).

"The Protestants giv earnest money and demoralize families. When a father sternly rebukes his children it is not unusual for them to reply with the insolent threat, 'I'll go to the mission'" (Mislin, Les Lieux Saints, vol. iii, chap. xxviii).

"Converts from the Jews receive baptism in different cities before they reach Jerusalem, where they are finally re-baptized. . . . Baptism was the only good business we had, and who has spoiled it? The Jews themselvs, by underselling one another" (Jews in the East, vol. ii, chap. ii).

"No one will hav anything to do with a 'missionary boy,' if he can possibly get another. One broad truth remains, that, in attempting to convert a South Sea Islander into a Christian, the missionaries rarely fail to convert an innocent and industrious savage into an idle and worthless scoundrel" (Advances of Australia, by the Hon. H. Finch-Hatton, pp. 144–5).

Chicago Secular News.

Last Sunday evening Col. A. J. Grover gave a very able lecture before the Chicago Secular Union on "Romanism; or, Danger Ahead." The hall was crowded, and the discussion following the lecture animated, several Catholics speaking in the debate—among them P. J. Dusey, the Irish labor agitator, who was arrested with the Anarchists last May, and, for some unexplained reason, discharged. On the labor question Mr. Dusey was very radical, and had often held forth among the Lake Front orators, and for this reason it has been persistently asked, Why was this discrimination made in favor of Mr. Dusey? Was it because Mr. Dusey was a Roman Catholic, and an Irishman? In the criticisms following Colonel Grover's lecture, the gentleman, who has always been a Catholic, bravely solves the problem; and it is to be hoped that Freethinkers who hav permitted themselvs to be influenced by the press of Chicago will make a note of Mr. Dusey's words. When the true inwardness of the Anarchists' arrest and trial is divulged, it will be found, as has by many been maintained, to hav moved along that old line of Romish persecution which began away back in the centuries, and whose Jesuitical influence shadows the civilization of to-day.

The synopsis of the lecture is from the Chicago Times.

The meeting was called to order by the president, Mr. E. A. Stevens. Col. A. J. Grover was introduced, and read a paper on "Romanism; or, Danger Ahead."

He commenced by asking, "What is Romanism?" and stated that only short, inadequate answers could be given to the question in a half-hour's paper. The officials of the Romau church claim that its whole outfit—creed and credentials—are directly from God. This stupendous falsehood and fraud could only find acceptance in credulity inconceivable if the credulity were not an indisputable fact. Human nature has an animal and a spiritual side. The Roman church has always found its material on the animal side, and as the animal in man greatly predominates, therefore Romanism has had a fruitful field and a rich harvest. Cockle burrs and Canada thistles grow on a farm without cultivation; if they were cultivated, what a crop they would produce! The Roman church is cultivating the cockle burrs and thistles which spring from the animal side of human nature, and no wonder the crop is abundant. Romanism is a despotism. It is, command and obey. It is credulity under the heel of infallibility, fear cowering before arrogance, simplicity in the toils of subtle fraud. It is the body of which the doctrin, "The end justifies the means," is the soul.

About two years ago the head of this body issued his bull against the progressiv tendencies of the age, free schools, free press, free thinking, Freemasonry, and a Republican government. Every good Romanist is bound to be opposed to Freemasonry, free schools, and secret societies. Yet popery itself is a secret society, and has always maintained itself by secret conclaves and conspiracies against the freedom of the human mind. It has done its work in all ages underground. It has never rendered any account to those who hav contributed to its revenues. The public is excluded from its councils, convents, and nunneries, from which seldom either report or victim escapes. The oaths administered to its ecclesiastics render all other obligations void at the option of the pope.

It has issued, and no doubt will again, secret orders to plunder and assassinate heretics—the French Huguenots for instance. The machinery of the Inquisition was secret. The Bible has been kept as far as possible a sealed book, and it has persecuted or killed every thinker it could not silence, when it could do so with impunity, and it now attacks free schools, lest the children should become educated.

It pretends to save eternally or damn forever, the former for cash and credulity and the latter because cash and credulity are withheld. To make this trade in heaven and hell a success Rome has been a deadly enemy to all intelligence except of its officials, all secret organizations but its own, and all sovereignties but that of the pontiff. Its vast resources, sucked into its coffers by syphons of superstition, enable it to spread itself along the path of civilization like a pestilence. It often goes ahead of civilization, and by its fatal grip and sting and poison paralyzes the half-savage mind, and renders nations poor, degraded, idiotic. Italy, Spain, Ireland, Mexico, and Lower Canada sufficiently illustrate its deadly work.

Ireland would hav been free long ago but for the taxation levied upon her starving people by the Romish church. Ireland will never be well fed, educated, or hav Home Rule as long as she submits to be taxed by Rome as she has been and now is. She is ridden to death by popery and landlordism. The pope rides in the saddle; the landlord rides behind. Both must be unhorsed before Ireland will be free. Home rule now would be Rome rule. Two tyrants are better than one for Ireland. Spain has had home rule, but she has been under the heel of Rome, and is the most degraded, poor, and ignorant of all the civilized nations as the result of more than twelve centuries of dominant popery. In Portugal, Italy, the South American states, Mexico, Lower Canada, and Quebec popery has sucked the vitality of the people like a vampire.

What has been done for these countries will be done for the United States if they yield to the demands of Rome as to free schools and Rome rule of cities and large towns. In 1790 only every twentieth man of the population was a Roman Catholic; now, according to the best data, about every sixth or seventh man is a Romanist. In New York city every third man is a Roman Catholic. The property of the Roman church has increased to an enormous aggregate, all of which is exempt from taxation. Thus indirectly every man who pays taxes is assessed to support the Roman church, as well as every Protestant church. Expensiv churches, cathedrals, convents, and nunneries are being built all over the land, and the attendance at these churches is generally five or six times as large as the attendance at Protestant churches. Saddest fact of all, Protestants directly and indirectly pay very largely to the revenues of Rome. More than $15,000 has been paid directly from the treasury of New York city within the last fifteen years to help support Catholic schools, convents, and other institutions run in the interest of Romanism. The lot on which the great cathedral in New York stands, worth a million, was sold for the city by Bill Tweed for one dollar.

Yet, does Beecher, does Robert Collyer, does any Protestant clergyman in New York or Brooklyn, thunder against these iniquities? If not, why not? One reason is, Protestantism is only a slight departure from Romanism. Another reason is, the politicians want the Roman vote, and require the silence of the Protestant pulpit. When Ingersoll lectures, the Protestant clergy and press open fire all along the line. Is Romanism less obnoxious than Freethinking? Popery is the same now as in Luther's time. Yet Protestantism is helping to build Catholic cathedrals, while celebrating Luther's birthday and erecting bronze statues to him. The present condition of political parties enables Rome to dictate the political situation and the success and defeat of candidates; its vast revenues enable it to buy legislation and judicial decisions when needed. Gibbons, the successor of McCloskey, was recently crowned king of Catholics at Baltimore with greater pomp and expense than any king or emperor in the Old World during the last fifty years. What an incongruous spectacle in a republic! The pope himself at length seems to be driven from Italy. Why should he not take up his residence in New York? No man now thinks of running for office until he has assured Rome that he is as good as a Romanist, or that his son is a Jesuit priest, or has married a Roman Catholic, or that his daughters hav joined the Roman Catholic church or gone to a convent. The friends of Blaine contracted for the Roman vote at the last election and expected it. The "Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion" alliteration of honest but indiscreet Mr. Burchard defeated Mr. Blaine. The Roman votes were not all delivered as per contract. It was a big job to transfer for the first time several millions of ignorant voters from the Democratic to the Republican side. The priests acted in good faith, however. But the delivery will be made next time unless the Democrats can raise Mr. Blaine's bid. Chicago has recently witnessed the successful transfer. And President Cleveland, as well as Blaine, is doing his level best, by appointments and otherwise, to please Romanists. He is affectionately kissing the pope's foot whenever it is struck out. He sent Secretary Lamar to Baltimore with his autograph letter of congratulation to Cardinal Gibbons, when he was crowned king. But Mr. Blaine soon went him several points better by giving his two daughters to Rome, as Lot threw his to the mob in Sodom. Having only two for the sacrifice, his son married another from the ranks of Rome. Blaine has now three daughters in the Roman Catholic church. There is luck in odd numbers. With one foot in the Protestant church and the other in the Roman, Mr. Blaine will get the almost solid Roman vote, and enough Protestant to elect him in 1888.

Then what will he do for Rome in return for the presidency? Rome controls the newspapers, has policed the cities, and in some instances elected the mayor and school board. Will Protestantism continue to cower and sneak? Will free schools succumb? Will Freemasonry surrender? Will office and vote mongers sell the liberty of this country to Rome for party success? The oath of allegiance of Romanists is not worth the paper on which it is written the moment the pope sees fit to require it to be disregarded. Every true Romanist owes a higher allegiance to the pope and the church than he owes or can owe to any government on earth. All good Catholics believe that the American Constitution is Atheistic and oppressiv to the church; that it is not, forthat reason, binding on his conscience. All men who believe in obedience to the pope, as against every other obligation, should be excluded from citizenship. Judges Zane and Powell, of Utath, hav recently held that Mormonism is necessarily antagonistic to the government. If so, a thousand times more is Romanism. Every Romanist should be required to take an iron-clad oath, forever renouncing the sovereignty of the pope before becoming a citizen, and Congress should at once provide the necessary legislation. The adherents of Jeff Davis and Joe Smith united are not half as dangerous to the republic as the Roman Catholics. Lafayette predicted that "if ever the liberty of the American republic is destroyed it will be the work of the Catholic priests." Religious liberty must be preserved. But religious liberty is not liberty to destroy liberty. It is not liberty to set aside oaths or grant indulgence to crime. These should be indictable offenses. He did not say that the Roman church never did any good. It has always sugar-coated its iniquitous system with a thin varnish of good works. It will remain true that a good Catholic cannot be a good citizen of the republic. No man can serve two masters. This country cannot long remain half free and half Roman Catholic. A numerical minority, wielded as a political unit, is equal to a majority. There is no country or spot on the globe where Romanism has power that liberty survives in. Liberty and papacy cannot coexist. It the whole history of Romanism proves this, what ground is there to hope this country will prove an exception?

After an announcement by the president that Professor Somers would giv an illustrated lecture on phrenology the next Sunday evening, the floor was given to the critics. P. J. Dusey said:

The gentleman has spoken about policeing the city with Catholics. If I was a Protestant, I would be in the county jail with the eight men condemned to death. I was a Catholic, and so I am free. They asked me if I was a Catholic. I said I was. Mr. Firthman (a detectiv) said, "Don't you think it a shame that you, a Catholic, should be in this conspiracy?" I said, "We are not in any conspiracy; it is you who are the conspirators." It is time that the American people rise in their might, and I will go as a witness and tell what I know. They tried to say I was a Swede. They, the police, asked my wife if I wasn't a Swede. For once I found Patrick was a lucky name. I was arrested three times, and let go because I was a Catholic. And I would ask any man here, what is the use of swearing if you don't believe in an oath? Catholicism is running Chicago, and in New York Dr. McGlynn has been summoned to Rome. I am a Freethinker, and although I go to church, I do not agree with everything that is said there.

A young Catholic gentleman followed Mr. Dusey. The lecturer, he said, denounces the Bible, and wishes he was a Freemason, and he can't be a Mason and denounce the Bible. Solomon, we are told, was the wisest man. Solomon was a religious man, and his sayings hav helped to form governments, to form men themselvs. The speaker concluded by asserting that Solomon had formed Irishmen, and for this reason they were the strongest men, and finally sat down demoralized, amid much laughter and applause.

General Trumbull said:

There are one or two points in the lecture with which I cannot agree. Colonel Grover says that he believes that the order of Masons is destined to save liberty in this country against the encroachments of Rome. Had he been a Mason, he would never hav made that prophecy. Another point I dissent from is this, that the Protestant churches vary but little from Romanism in their tendency to suppress liberty. As political organizations, the difference is too wide for contrast. The Protestant sect is loyal to this country, and the Catholic sect is not; and that is an immense difference. Out of the consciousness of a Roman Catholic, born, baptized, and educated in the Roman church, I would hav held it as an insult if any man had accused me of being true to my country, when the pope demanded my allegiance. That is the danger from Romanism. The danger from Romanism is the conspiracies of Romanism. This little society that meets here has done more to thwart Romanism than all the Masonic societies in Chicago. The Roman Catholic vote is the only vote in this country that is organized in the interests of a foreign power.

Mr. Gravelet said:

I was raised as a Catholic, but I am now an Agnostic. Half of my time in school was put in in praying. I became convinced through investigation that the Roman religion is the invention of man. It reflects the people who hav made it. It is my experience in the church that has made me stand with an organization of Freethinkers. The pope once said to a reporter that if the Roman church ever outnumbered other religions in this country, liberty would cease.

Mr. Gleason said:

My friend, General Trumbull, has an idea that Romanism is a political party. Did the sixty-eight thousand who voted for Henry George in New York believe in the old religion? The times of Knownothingism are going in this country. Is Phil Armour an ignorant Catholic? Is Jay Gould an ignorant Catholic? The men who rob the nation, who oppress the people, are in the churches. In the wards where they had the most superstitions, they voted the reform labor ticket. In the wards where there was no superstition, they voted the straight Democratic or Republican ticket.

Mr. Stevens said:

Mr. Gleason is a special pleader of no mean ability. Whenever you find a man who is talking for human liberty, he is not a good Catholic. I had to renounce my allegiance to Great Britain to become a citizen of this country. Isn't it just, isn't it. right, that the Catholic should renounce his allegiance to Rome before he can become a citizen? A man cannot keep his oath of allegiance to the church and become a good citizen of the United States. I hav no sympathy with Knownothingism—with the ostracism of a man because he is a foreigner—but this is not a question of Knownothingism, but of the rule of Rome, and if the object of any individual be to deprive the people of their liberty, then that man is a traitor. In voting for Henry George, in New York, the people voted against Rome. Cardinal Manning said: "I acknowledge no civil power. I am the supreme judge of what is right and wrong." The Catholic church says it is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. A society that boasts that it is unchangeable hasn't much idea of progression.

The lecturer then replied to his critics:

I indorse everything that Mr. Dusey has said. I believe it is true. I agree with Mr. Trumbull, that there is a vast difference between Romanism and Protestantism. The Protestants can be good citizens, but their superstitions are the same. I don't claim to know anything about Masonry, but I find that every pope has issued his bull against it. In the old antislavery days, we Abolitionists used to watch Jeff Davis and the pro-slavery leaders, and if we found them placing themselvs on one side of any question, we would take the other, assured from experience that they were against liberty. A large number of Catholics voted for Henry George. I would hav voted with them. It is the best symptom I hav seen in five years. The pope has summoned Father McGlynn to Rome for voting for Henry George. What has my friend Gleason to say to that?

Col. A. J. Grover is about publishing a book entitled, "Romanism; or, Danger ahead.

MRS. A. M. FREEMAN,
Dec. 14, 1886. Sec. Chicago Sec. Union.

The Liberal Club.

There were no minutes of the previous meeting read at the 426th regular assembling of the Manhattan Liberal Club. The Chair announced that sad state of affairs with regret. The secretary had joined the Workingwomen's Fair Association to buy the new daily newspaper a press, and had deserted her old post. There were no copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER on the table, and the business end of the hall looked unfurnished.

The attendance was good, and as beautiful as it was good. Professor Denslow was down as the lecturer, but when the time came to open the meeting he had not appeared. The Chair said the "Coming Constitutional Convention" would hav to be discussed whether the professor came or not. Somebody asked Mr. Samuel Leavitt to take the initiativ. Mr. Leavitt declined; he was still weary from having recently made sixty speeches for Henry George. Mr. Putnam recommended the small but talented Mr. King. Mr. King wouldn't do it. Dr. Levison yielded to the urgent solicitation of the Chair, and proceeded to say that our law courts needed reforming. As administerers of justice they were not a success. The entrance of Professor Denslow prevented Dr. Levison from further developing his ideas in this direction.

Professor Denslow's lecture was a brief history of various provisions of our constitution, with occasional references to Socialism and Henry George. He had no recommendations to offer the coming convention, and believed it would be the worst place in the world to present new ideas.

At the close of the lecture the speaker was highly commended by the Chair for his learned discourse.

Dr. Levison again took the floor. He intimated that he would like more than ten minutes for the discussion of so vast a subject, but the Chair was obdurate and took none of the doctor's hints. Dr. Levison believed that all laws should go before the people for ratification before they are put upon the statute books.

Mr. Wakeman asked everybody to sign a petition for the commutation of the sentence of Roxanna Druse. A failing of lawyers, he said, was that they were guided too far by precedent, and bent their researches to finding out what had been instead of what ought to be. Lawyers should be made the counsellors instead of the mere instruments of their clients. That this might be effected, Mr. Wakeman would hav them paid by salary instead of fee.

Samuel Leavitt agreed with Mr. Wakeman and disagreed with Henry George on the land question and on free trade. Mr. Leavitt defined himself as a missing link between David Ripley and his class, and the modern Socialists. He was, in fact, a Fourierite.

Captain Clark, the mariner, who has taken observations in all parts of the world, civilized and barbarous, made a startling address. He expressed great disdain for scientific men, and hoped he would not be mistaken for one. Mr. Levison suggested that there was little danger of that, and the captain went on. He said that when it was proposed by practical men to send a steamer across the Atlantic, Dr. Lardner, a scientific man, denied the possibility of such a thing, and promised to eat the first steamer that made the trip; but when the Savannah accomplished that undertaking Dr. Lardner had lost his appetite, and did not eat even a jolly boat. Captain Clark was especially antagonistic toward Socialism. Applying what he had learned by observation in all parts of the world, civilized and barbarous, he would avoid Socialists and Anarchists in other countries and fight them in this. George Washington, who was the father of his country, warned the American people to beware of foreign influence. We must pull in the gang-plank; the boat is loaded; we don't want any more. The captain was in hopes the Topolobampo colony would flourish and attract all the Socialists to Mexico.

Mr. Brophy, formerly of Boston, criticised the lecturer of the evening somewhat sharply.

Dr. Weeks thought Professor Denslow's lecture a valuable one. The devil needed able advocates, and found one in the professor. Dr. Weeks was glad of this, because he believed in hearing all sides—the devil's as well as the rest.

In replying, Professor Denslow said in reference to Mr. Brophy that he possibly might know as much about the question as himself (the speaker), but the chances were ninety-nine in a hundred that he didn't. The professor had spent his life in study; Mr. Brophy had wasted his time in growling. The speaker believed that a man will not, on the average, gather as much useful information by growling as by study. Touching the economic question, he said that demand causes all values. The "advanced" position of Anarchists and Socialists is not due to their brilliancy but their stupidity. If the Chicago Anarchists had learned the lessons which he had endeavored to teach them, they would not now be in jail with a rope around their necks. In conclusion, Dr. Denslow said that while he claimed as much humane feeling as any other man could possess, he was not one of those who seek to gain the credit of sympathizing with the poor by denouncing the rich. Nothing was cheaper than a reputation for philanthropy gained in that way.

A celebration of the Yuletide will mark the next meeting—singing, speaking, reciting, and other festivities.

American Secular Union.

For the information of those who desire to form local societies and unite with the national organization, the following is printed. The form of constitution is simply for suggestion, and changes can be made as the members of local societies may think best in order to do a more varied intellectual and social work.

HOW TO ORGANIZE A SECULAR UNION.

The American Secular Union is formed by the union of Local Auxiliary Societies. To organize a Local Auxiliary Society, any person (man or woman) may place the following Call at the head of a sheet of paper and solicit signatures:

CALL.

WE, the undersigned citizens of [here introduce name of town or city], agree to organize an Auxiliary Secular Union, to work in connection with the American Secular Union, and to pay the sums set opposit our names for that purpose.

Names.	Residences.	Amounts.

As soon as ten persons hav subscribed to this Call, and five dollars hav been paid in, make out an application for a Charter, inclosing the application, together with a money order or postal note for five dollars (or the amount may be inclosed in a registered letter) to the secretary of the American Secular Union.

Any Liberal society can by a vote qualify itself an Auxiliary Secular Union, and take out a charter.

On receipt of the five dollars and application signed by the president and secretary (or the temporary secretary) of the new Union (and as many others as may choose), the secretary will forward to the applicant a charter signed by the proper officers of the American Secular Union.

SUPPORT OF THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION.

In order to provide an adequate revenue to the treasury of the American Secular Union, to enable it to carry out the requirements of sections 4, 5, and 6 of Article III. of its Constitution, and to do other legitimate work of the Union, every auxiliary is requested to contribute a certain sum monthly, not less than five cents per month from each one of its members, for the use of the American Secular Union. The amount thus collected should be remitted quarterly on the first days of January, April, July, and October, by the secretary of the auxiliary to the secretary of the American Secular Union.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the state in matters of religion; and,

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselvs together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1. The name of this Association shall be THE SECULAR UNION OF ——.

ART. 2. The object of the Secular Union shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——.

ART. 3. The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4. Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the Union as shall be prescribed in the By-laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5. Any person may become a member of the Union by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6. The Officers of the Union shall be a President, a Vice-President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executiv Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex officio delegates to the National Convention of Secular Unions when called together.

ART. 7. These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall hav been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

New England Freethinkers' Convention.

From the Boston Investigator.

The Ingersoll Secular Society, at a meeting held in October last, appointed the following committee to arrange for a Convention of the Freethinkers of New England, to be held in the Paine Memorial, Boston, on Saturday, Jan. 29, and Sunday, 30, 1887: L. K. Washburn, Ernest Mendum, S. G. Swett, with L. K. Washburn as chairman. John A. O'Malley was elected treasurer.

CALL FOR THE CONVENTION.

To the Freethinkers of New England: You are invited to meet in Convention in the Paine Memorial, Boston, on Jan. 29 and 30, 1887, among other things, to celebrate in appropriate exercises the anniversary of the birthday of Thomas Paine—the man who gave his life, talents, and services to the whole world; who loved liberty as a mother loves her child, and whose body, mind, and heart were consecrated to liberty; and who was inspired through a long and noble career with the desire to see mankind more elevated, more enlightened, and more humane; and also to giv expression and encouragement to those cherished principles of mental freedom which alone make human happiness possible and secure the opportunity for human advancement.

There never was a time in the history of our country when earnest, bold, and wise utterance of those ideas and principles that we love and cherish, and for whose further success we are working, was more demanded, and we ask you to come to this Convention to support, by your presence and influence, the cause of Freethought and mental liberty.

We need to take counsel together to see what action we should take toward defeating that arrogant and self-seeking power, ecclesiasticism, whose emissaries are using the privileges of religious freedom to build up in our free land an ecclesiastical tyranny, whose presence is a constant menace to our rights, to our liberties, and to our institutions.

We need, furthermore, to meet together to become better acquainted with one another, to seek a broader union and fellowship, and to foster those sympathies which are born of a common faith and a common purpose.

To make this Convention what we desire to hav it, an inspiration and impetus to every Liberal in the United States—we need assistance and coöperation. First, we need your attendance—in numbers there is strength. Next, we need money to meet the expenses of the Convention; and, lastly, we need the voice and thought of our best speakers and leaders. Let us hav these, and we shall hav success.

Address all communications to L. K. Washburn, Paine Memorial, Boston, Mass.

Contributions for the Convention may be sent to John A. O'Malley, Paine Memorial, Boston, Mass.

Lectures and Meetings.

MR. T. B. WAKEMAN closed his series of discourses before the Society of Humanity on Sunday of last week, and many appreciativ remarks testify to the value of his efforts at translating the old into the new. Last Sunday evening Mr. S. P. Putnam addressed the society at 28 Lafayette Place. His subject was "The New God." It was an address filled with new and striking thoughts. A hundred "Gems" for THE TRUTH SEEKER'S column could be culled from it. Mr. Putnam speaks again Sunday evening, the 26th, at the same place The lectures so far before this society hav been of a high character, and the prospect is bright.

W. F. JAMIESON is having good success in Denver, Col., where he is engaged for Sunday evenings for six months. He says that he will, however, giv way for any of his brother lecturers traveling through the West, so that they can hav an opportunity to address the Denver people. Notice several weeks in advance should be given, so that Mr. Jamieson can respond to the many calls for lectures which he is receiving. He has calls at Abilene, Industry, and Enterprise, Kansas; Osceola, Wilber, and other towns in Nebraska. These calls he cannot get time to fill until spring. He will giv four lectures in Canyon City, Col., December 21st, 22d, 23d, 24th; in Black Hawk, two lectures; three in Central City; Loveland sometime in January. He has concluded to make Colorado his future home. He considers it superior to Minnesota as a state, far ahead in climate, and more Liberal people than he met in any one state.

Hard but Truthful Words about Mr. Talmage.

From the Industrial Appeal, Ottumwa, Iowa.

Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., of Brooklyn, N. Y., is a premeditated liar. We don't mean any disrespect to any honest and truthful minister who occupies a pulpit. But this boss liar of the pulpit is too ridiculous in his economy of the truth for any good, doxy or no doxy. He it was who told as truth, in his pulpit, about the burning man—the man who spontaneously combusted near Lima, Ohio, we think, while blaspheming God during the provoking drouth last summer. The New York Sun tried to get him to explain more fully and giv particulars, but he prevaricated, with various excuses, and refused to be more explicit, but again declared the truthfulness of the story. But now THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York, the most prominent and ablest Freethought paper in the country, to clinch the matter, offers the reverend liar $1,000 if he will substantiate, by competent testimony, the truth of the story. Of course THE TRUTH SEEKER will not hav to come down with the cash, but Mr. Talmage will tumble in the estimation of truth-loving people.

Law and Religion.

The Supreme Court of Tennessee has decided that a blacksmith belonging to a Christian sect that keeps the seventh instead of the first day of the week as Sunday violates the law by working at his trade on the day observed by the general community as Sunday.

The Supreme Court of Connecticut has decided that a pavilion used by a "Spiritualistic camp-meeting association" for religious services on Sunday, and for "dancing and parlor skating" during the week is not exempt from taxation as a church.

The Supreme Court of New Hampshire has decided that the Constitutional guarantee that "every individual has a natural and unalienable right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience and reason" does not secure to the Salvation Army the right to worship by beating the bass drum.—New York Herald.

Best of Their Kind.

The "Origin of the Christian Bible," by O. B. Whitford, M.D.; "Bible Temperance, Liquor-Drinking Commended, Defended, and Enjoined by the Bible," by Edwin C. Walker; "A Masonic Vindication of Right—a Protest Against Persecution," by O. B. Whitford, and "Personal Existence After Death Improbable," by L. R. Smith, are the latest productions of the Truth Seeker Publishing Company, New York, all of which may be read with interest for the bold and startling ideas they contain. They may each be procured for 10, 15, and 25 cents, and to those who take pleasure in intricate arguments upon abstract questions will here find what they want.—Galveston Daily News.

A Short Homily on Law.

Blackstone defines law to be "a rule of action." No better definition could be given unless it be Judge Porter's: "A rule of human action."

We trace law, the common law, back to England. England, through Blackstone, compiled the common law from the old Roman government; Rome translated the common law from Egypt, and Egypt got the law from India, the father of all literature.

The origin of law came from the brutality of barbarous tribes. Its origin and foundation was and is upon the principle that "might makes right." Abraham Lincoln said that "right made might." The president meant that right ought to make might.

The stronger overcame the weaker and took possession of the earth.

Blackstone says that the origin of property, or the first deed drawn, was the quarrel between Abram and Lot; but with all due deference to the king of law commentators, I beg to say that the distribution of property began as early as man's avarice and power to seize the property of the weaker; in other words, therefore, the earliest title deeds to real estate bore the great seal of Theft.

Blackstone again comments that from personal combats over property man gathered in communities of tribes, and one tribe fought and dispossessed another, and hence the growth of states; the leaders of tribes became kings, and then nations went out to war, and stole on the wholesale.

The strongest possessing all the wealth of the earth, it became necessary for their protection from the poor and weak of the earth that courts and officers be instituted and prisons built, and even standing armies be kept to keep the poor in subjection, so that to-day Europe can put in the field ten million soldiers against one another—each nation against the other. And, strange to say, the poor, except the officers, compose these vast armies.

The majesty of the law to-day, by brute force, protects the few in the enjoyment of and the possession of all the wealth and lands of the earth, and it requires the vast machinery of courts, armies, and prisons to accomplish this end. The few of earth hav its vast wealth, and they dictate the price of every commodity, and to the laboring man his wages. He can take what the wealthy offer, or starve, die, or go to prison or the workhouse.

There are in America one hundred thousand deadbeats, vulgarly called preachers, who get from $500 up to $25,000 a year salary for preaching from Bible texts like the following: "Submit yourselvs to kings and rulers, for the powers that be are ordained of God." These preachers portray a heaven of bliss hereafter for the submissiv poor, but a present heaven of good things for the wealthy. They stand weekly in one hundred thousand pulpits, where no back talk is permitted, with the gag ready at hand, and if one dare question the doctrin promulgated, he is relegated to prison. If the money paid these deadbeats was given to the widows and orphans to clothe, feed, and educate, besides procuring homes for this class of mankind, there would be need for less prisons and workhouses. But this self-called and self-constituted herd of Pharisees claim that an almighty God called them, and set them apart to the work of ministering to the poor and the outcast, and they do it with a will, by taking two collections each Sabbath, and feeding the poor and the outcast upon the dry crust of faith and hope, while these Pharisees fare sumptuously every day.

The American Revolution was simply a rebellion against the common and ecclesiastical law of England (a fine bastard mixture, or tertium quid), headed by Paine, Jefferson, Franklin, and others, who took pains to leave God on the other side of the Atlantic and out of the Constitution, when it was adopted.

It is well known that the clergy were opposed to the independence of the colonies, but a quarter of a century had not elapsed after the great ship of state was launched when the preachers claimed that they killed the bear; that they established the new government, or rather God did through their prayers. It is certain God did not establish this great government on account of any fighting the clergy ever did.

Before the war of 1861 the churches were a unit in favor of the institution of slavery, and preached it as a divine institution. But after the war Parson Newman claimed that Christ, through his servant Abraham Lincoln, issued the great proclamation of freedom. So said all the clergy. Now, it is well known that Mr. Lincoln once wrote a book about this same Jesus, pronouncing him an illegitimate child, etc., and that Mr. Lincoln was an Infidel there is no doubt. But the abolition of slavery was the grandest move earth ever made in favor of the despised poor and the laboring man.

It modified the awful harshness of the law, and took away part of its sting. The immortal Lincoln said when he issued it that "in giving freedom to the slaves we insure freedom to the free."

The armies that fought the battles of the Union were composed of poor men, except the officers, while the bondholders, the bankers, and the rich dudes stayed at home. And we who served three years to preserve liberty upon the earth hav had the least of it. The wounded were pensioned off with from two to eight dollars per month, while the dudes took possession of all the offices in this great republic; and to-day the soldier is relegated to the rear, to the soldiers' homes, as bad as workhouses, and to the poorhouses of the land.

Hear ye the conclusion of the whole matter. America has sixty million of people; ten million hav all the wealth, all the law; are clothed in purple and fine linen and fare sumptuously every day, while fifty million are clothed in rags and misery, toiling from day to day, either in or out of prisons. The poor possess all the poorhouses, the asylums, the workhouses, the lock-ups, the jails and the penitentiaries. The rich sit in their velvet-cushioned seats in the churches, listening to the sacred music of the paid choir and the broadcloth preacher, while the steeples outside are pointing to God. My opinion is that the day is not far distant when guillotins will stand as thick in Europe and America as they did during the French Revolution in France.

Oh! the majesty of the law that has made earth a heaven for the few and a hell for the many! As Colonel Ingersoll says, "Honest labor is clothed in rags, while idleness sits in the banqueting hall." And all this is the work of an omnipotent God, boundless in love and benevolence, and whose long-suffering is a surprise to the universe.

GEORGE H. BETHARD.

Thomas Paine on Poverty.

In the year 1772, Thomas Paine, at the request of some of his superiors in the excise office, wrote for publication the "Case of the Officers of Excise." The "performance," as he termed it (and this was a characteristic term of Junius), was so much praised that he remarked in a letter to Goldsmith, then a stranger to him, "Were I not rather singularly modest, I should insensibly become a little vain." Three thousand copies were subscribed for the officers in general, and one thousand were reserved for distribution.

The object of the publication was to obtain increased pay for the excisemen. An out-ride officer received only £50 a year, out of which he had to pay the expenses of horse-keeping.

What can be more eloquent, tender, and truthful than some passages in that essay on poverty? For example:

> If the gay find it difficult to resist the allurements of pleasure, the great the temptations of ambition, or the miser the acquisition of wealth, how much stronger are the provocations of want and poverty!
> The bread of deceit is a bread of bitterness; but, alas! how few in times of want and hardship are capable of thinking so; objects appear under new colors and in shapes not naturally their own; hunger sucks in the deception, and necessarily reconciles it to conscience.
> Poverty, in defiance of principle, begets a degree of meanness that will stoop to almost anything. A thousand refinements of argument may be brought to prove that the practice of honesty will be the same in the most trying and necessitous circumstances. He who was never an hungered man may argue finely on the subjection of his appetite, and he who never was distressed may harang as beautifully on the power of principle. But poverty, like grief, has an incurable deafness, which never hears; the oration loses its edge, and the "To be or not to be" becomes the only question.
> There is a striking difference between dishonesty arising from want of food, and want of principle. The first is worthy of compassion, the other of punishment. Nature never produced a man who would starve in a well-stored larder because the provisions were not his own; but he who robs it from luxury of appetite deserves a gibbet.

This was written and published in 1772. In March of that same year, Woodfall, the printer of The Public Advertiser, issued a complete edition of the "Letters of Junius," with a "Dedication to the English Nation," and a preface, both prepared by the unknown writer. Woodfall tendered to Junius one-half the profits of the book; to this Junius replied as follows:

> What you say about the profits is very handsome. I like to deal with such men. As for myself, be assured that I am far above all pecuniary views, and no other person, I think, has any claim to share with you. Make the most of it therefore, and let all your views in life be directed to a solid, however moderate, independence. Without it no man can be happy, nor even honest.

Let the reader compare these few lines, especially the last ten words, with the preceding quotations from Paine's essay written the same year, and see how strikingly they coincide in sentiment. And then let him compare this act of Junius with Paine's life-long refusal to make any profit from his literary work. Not one writer in, at least, a thousand would act thus; but here were two contemporary examples. Multiply one thousand by one thousand and you hav a million to one that Paine was Junius.

Furthermore, although all of Paine's biographers hav supposed that he was poor, it is now certain that he was not. That is to say, he always had what Junius advised Woodfall to secure, namely, "a solid, however moderate, independence." Hence he could always be happy and honest.

BURR.

The Mormon Economy.

If the name "Mormon" unwinds in your mind, as in mine until yesterday, a skein of fantastic superstition with the harem as its bobbin, then, like me, you hav a surprise in store. Nothing new about the superstition—that is not in question—but did you know that the Mormons were a pioneer corps, who hav initiated the national solution of the labor problems by methodical coöperation and proportional distribution, which, in embracing social charities, avoids Communism?

Did you know that the Mormons had done away with the complexity of legal precedents, and that they settled their disputes without litigation, in free courts of umpiry?

Did you know that in their plural marriages the faculty of divorce was optional with wives and not with husbands, and yet did not forfeit alimony; so that in a proprietary sense their marriage subjected the male to the female?

Did you know that many Mormon women were refined ladies, and intellectually facultativ?

Well, the work before me brings conviction of all this, not only from the author's caliber of thought-force, but by the citation of local documents, official and private. In Mr. Lum's view, the polygamy issue is but a blind, and the persecution of the Mormons results from a conflict between the old routine of exploitation, with its internecine competitions, and the new order of social coöperation. Coöperation was a cherished ideal with both Joseph Smith and Brigham Young, and permeated their religious teachings. Then it became a practical necessity on their arrival at Utah, where subsistence depended on great works of irrigation, which made the desert blossom. It was promoted by the famin of 1856, when the wealthier saved the colony by the sacrifice of their private property. It was commercially inaugurated in 1868 by the Zion Coöperativ Mercantil Institution, with a capital of $1,000,000, which has since done business to the amount of over $15,000,000, has never had a note protested, has simplified commerce to a single profit between producer and consumer, has enlisted a large proportion of the citizens as stockholders, and kept prices down during times of scarcity, its avowed policy being to abolish speculativ profits.

The Z. C. M. I. has branches in the outlying Mormon colonies, and though it does not exclude competition it controls prices.

To this innovation, on a scale parallel with that of Rochdale and over fourteen hundred coöperativ stores in England, against which jealousy attempted to bias legislation during Disraeli's premiership, Utah adds the scandal of dispensing with lawyers, and giving judgments gratis by free courts in civil suits, a democratic mode of arbitration which proves satisfactory to honest folks but is very unpopular with foxes and sharks.

About land tenures Mr. Lum does not go into particulars, but says that speculation in the soil is not encouraged, and that only four per cent of farms exceed five hundred acres.

The Mormon church, irrespectiv of its doctrins, does not form a distinct theocratic corps, like the Catholic or the Church of England. It is not a property-holder to any extent beyond its halls of assembly, and becomes democratic by the great number of its dignitaries, for every thrifty citizen is likely to be a bishop.

In his chapter on plural marriage, Mr. Lum shows that Mormon laws and customs are in some important points more liberal towards wives than either Christian or Mohammedan. Only about two per cent are polygamists. The style among the wealthy is to giv each wife a separate establishment. Infidelity does not forfeit alimony nor constitute a title for divorce in favor of the husband, while on the side of the wife divorce is optional, in so far at least as personal free will is consistent with superstition, for marriage, with the Mormons, takes hold on immortality.

Without being a polygamist or flattering their superstitions, Mr. Lum is disposed to condone these features as organically interwoven with exemplary economic institutions and a great public spirit of mutual good will shown in the forgivness of debts, etc. While protesting, with Mr. Lum, against the present governmental persecution of polygamists, so iniquitous, especially toward the wives and children, whose abandonment it requires, we submit, concerning polygamy, that, being confined to the wealthy, as population increases while facilities of dispersion lessen, must not the monopoly of possession in a sort of property at once the most coveted and the most expensiv, seem to justify, as it necessitates, exploitation of the laboring class to maintain its luxury?

Possibly at present the economic institutions of Utah may be so inwoven with its judicial system, and both with its religious and social, that they must develop or disappear together, yet such organic connection would depend on the influences of personal character and education in this particular case, without having any general or essential relation.

That clerical dignities based upon secular attainments, or the graft of the bishop on the successful business man, is a feature of society more robust and vivacious than ours, may be admitted without admitting the desirability of any clerical dignity or bishop with their related superstitions. The business man as theocrat may be less hypocritical and more truly respectable, but will he be less oppressiv by his privileges?

Whatever may be the motivs of envy and malice against the Mormons among the gentiles in their midst, it is probable that the passiv acquiescence of the people of the United States in their iniquitous persecution by the Cleveland administration is due to clerical influence; for this is far more jealous, more malignant, and more far-sighted than the mercantil, and their consecrated privilege over marriage was challenged by the institution of polygamy in a more practical sense than could be possible by any abstract doctrin. EDGEWORTH.

The Money Question.

Greenbackers and others are just now circulating petitions to Congress to hav a law passed with reference to the coinage of silver. It is indeed strange that people should be so foolish as to think that Congress can fix the relativ value of gold and silver. It seems to me that the Congress could just as easily fix the relativ value of wheat, oats, and potatoes. It would be just as sensible to petition Congress for rain.

I would like to submit the following petition to Congress instead of the one now in circulation:

To the Honorable Members of the Senate and Congress of the United States:

Whereas, the present banking system of the United States is very defectiv, and is the cause of great injustice and suffering to a large majority of the people;

Whereas, it does not supply a uniform amount of money per capita to the people, but has during the last twenty-five years placed as high as fifty-six dollars per capita in circulation, and as low as thirteen;

Whereas, no system of banking which cannot keep a fixed amount of money per capita in circulation can be a just system; and

Whereas, the expansion and contraction of the currency is a great national evil and the chief cause of financial crises,

We, therefore, the undersigned, do petition your honorable bodies to establish a national system of banking. By this we mean

That a banking department shall be established as we now hav a postal department.

That branch banks shall be established in all business centers.

That they shall be managed by salaried officers of the government, who shall be required to report monthly to Washington to the chief of the department.

That these bank agents shall loan the national money on certain specified securities, and shall accept deposits.

That the interest charged on loans shall be one per cent per annum more than that allowed on deposits, or such other sum as may be found necessary to pay the expenses of banking.

That borrowers shall be allowed to pay the principal at any time they choose, but they shall be compelled to pay the interest monthly, the rate of which shall be fixed monthly by the head of the department at Washington.

That all borrowers in all parts of the country shall be charged the same interest, namely, that charged during the time they hav the money.

That the sum per capita to be put in circulation, and maintained in circulation, shall be forty dollars.

That the new national money shall be made wholly of paper, and of various denominations from one cent to one hundred dollars.

That no money, except the new national money, shall be legal tender for debts.

That all money now in circulation shall be accepted at the banks at par.

That bank agents shall forward monthly to Washington all moneys taken in exchange for the national money, and that the coin so sent to Washington shall be cast into bullion, and sold as such to all desiring it, and the paper money so sent shall be destroyed.

That in order to get the national money into circulation as soon as possible, agents shall commence to loan at the rate of two per cent per annum.

That the rate of interest shall be changed monthly if necessary; that is, it shall be raised monthly when the amount per capita in circulation is more than forty dollars, and shall be lowered monthly when that sum is less than forty dollars,

That the bank agents shall never refuse to loan when the requisit security is offered.

That, in order to abolish the present unjust and oppressiv pawnbroking system, bank agents shall loan money at the regular interest on such security as pawnbrokers now loan on.

The principal objections to the above system are:

1. That it would complicate the functions of the government and increase the evils of patronage. But the post-office could be managed by private corporations, as well as railways and the express are now. There is nothing about carrying the mails which makes it peculiarly necessary that the government should manage it; but it is necessary that the government should manage the banking system, as on no other principle can a uniform amount of money be kept in circulation, and no money can be good if its volume per capita can be materially changed. If, therefore, the government cannot safely run both the post-office and the banks, why not sell the post-office out to Jay Gould, and run the banks in its stead?

2. Paper money is not good unless it has a metallic basis. This is a foolish statement, for in 1879 we had $256,736,947 more paper money in circulation than all our metallic moneys combined, yet no person told us that it was not good, and we know that in places it was loaned at from two to six per cent per month.

3. Money must hav intrinsic value. This is not true, for the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that money is not a standard or measure of value, but that it represents value. It is no more necessary that money should hav intrinsic value than that milk tickets, railway tickets, and opera tickets should hav intrinsic value. What we want to know is that it will pass for value, and that it shall hav a uniform value. This can be secured only by keeping the volume per capita in circulation always the same. Metallic money, like paper money, changes its value in proportion as we change the amount per capita in circulation, and it is only better than paper money because it is more difficult to change its volume. But paper money, with its volume per capita absolutely fixed, will hav a more uniform value than any metallic money we now hav.

4. How could we trade with foreign countries? Merchants could buy gold bullion, and trade with it as they do now. We would hav as much gold then as now. Or they could take produce over to Europe and exchange it for their money and then for their goods. This would be no obstruction to foreign trade. But our protectiv tariff is a real obstruction.

5. Money should be loaned without interest. If the advocates of this scheme can show us how they could then control the volume of the currency per capita, we will giv in that they may be right, but not till then; for we feel sure that it is infinitly more important that the volume per capita should be kept uniform than that the money should be loaned without interest. Mixed Pickles.

Who knows who wrote these lines?

What mortals think they know of God
A thousand times rehearse;
What mortals do not know of God
Fills all the universe.

The author, whoever he was, understood how to work the multum in parvo compress to the last thread of the screw. More truth in these four lines than in the "thousand tomes."

Unless the Jersey governor interferes, Janitor Titus will hang for the murder of Tillie Smith, and hang upon circumstantial evidence only. No one should be judicially killed on circumstantial testimony alone. But, then, positiv evidence may be false—men hav been killed by the law's decree on false testimony. What is to be done? Killing by law should be done away with. Life imprisonment should take the place of the death penalty. Judicial murder is a relic of barbarism and the Inquisition, and very likely Jersey will cling to it as long as any state in the union, keeping green, as she does, the memory of the Inquisition. Boonton never would vote to abolish hanging. She would like to hav revived burning at the stake.

The Rev. Waldo Messaros is a Philadelphia parson. Like the most of "the cloth," he went into religion for the easy time and money there are in it, together with the opportunities it affords the would-be "masher," of whom the Rev. Messaros is which, so to speak—this is idiomatic, but understood, doubtless. The Rev. Mess. (for short), failing to "mash" one of the lambs of his flock in the conventional way, proceeded vi et armis in the direction of conquest, and thereby made a mess of it, the "sister" proving too many for him. He is now under indictment, $2,000 bail, and the conviction, of course, that he barked up the wrong tree. Doubtless a sadder, will he be a wiser man in the future?

The bishop of Manchester, England, is a "brick"—a "brick" of a bishop, understand—and the reason why is, because he has the pluck of his convictions in a matter where "moral courage" is more honored in the breach than in the observance, with ecclesiastics in general—the matter of rum or no rum. The bishop has the moral courage to say that "total abstinence" does not agree with him—the bishop and the writer stand on the same plane—and that he broke down utterly on the t. a. regimen. Having the conviction, from experience, that a little stimulant is a good thing to hav in the house, and in one's stomach, at times, he dares to say so frankly, in the face of all Christendom, let the galled jade of total abstinence wince as she may. Bishop, here's to you. Drink hearty, my boy—you're a "brick!" But, I say, bishop, if you would only hav the moral courage to declare the old hag of superstition, the Christian religion, a thing that does not agree with mortality in the shape of man, you would be a "gilt-edged brick," my gay and reverend sir. Come, now, own up to the truth, and knock your brother-ecclesiastics silly. Ha! that would be moral courage indeed, bishop! But your fat living and "livings"—yes, I know. It would be tough, and you are but mortal, even though invested bishop. You won't do it.

When the millennium shall hav come, what sports and pleasures known to us now will obtain, I wonder? The Berghs of that period will hav no horse-races, pigeon-shoots, cocking-mains, or anything of the kind; the Comstocks no pools, cards, nude in art, Decamerons à la Boccaccio, or anything of the sort; the Moodys no theaters, circuses, dancing, moonlight picnics, or anything of a like nature; the Neal Dows no wines, liquors, ales, hard cider, lager beer, or anything with the slightest kind of a stick in it; the Trasks no cigars, cigarets, or tobacco in any form; the parsons no Sunday papers, or any sort of entertainment on that day, save that afforded by themselvs; the ladies no clubs or "lodges" to inveigle the men and keep them out late o' nights; the prudes no beach bathing, save in flannel suits of sober blue and eminently proper cut, with no commingling of the sexes in the surf. Beyond the mildly exhilarating church fair, with raffle accompaniment—not to be countenanced in other directions; "moral shows," including "moral kangaroos;" "love feasts, with "kisses spiritual;" "hunting the slipper," "blind man's buff," "bird nesting," psalm singing, and kindred amusements (?), I can't imagin what the goody-goodies of the millennium would countenance or tolerate. On the whole, I don't think that the millennium is being hankered for to any great extent. I doubt that a majority of the parsons, even, would vote for it. They hav a softer snap under the present règime. SI SLOKUM.

Conflict Between Church and State.

From the Morning Oregonian, Portland, Or.

B. Coffey, Indian agent at Umatilla, is having some difficulty, not with the government he serves, but with the church he also serves, and that nominated him for the position. Rev. L. L. Conrady is priest in charge there, and he has his own views as to how matters should go, and especially farming matters, while Coffey follows his instructions and has done all he could to influence the Indians to take land in severalty. The inspectors, who lately visited his agency, credit Agent Coffey with having done much to bring about their acceptance, lately given, to the severalty system. They also gave him the highest testimonial words are capable of, as to his discretion and good management, while they strongly censure Father Conrady's course and conduct. They hav affidavits that the reverend gentleman has said, "Damn the Indians! I wish the black-pox would come and carry them all away!"

Not being able to hav his own way, Rev. Conrady broke up the school taught by Sisters of Mercy, who left the place. The inspectors, being on the ground, placed Miss Mary Coffey, daughter of the agent and an accomplished young lady, in charge of the school, with an educated half-breed and two advanced Indian girls as assistants. This was, it seems, considered a heinous offense on her part, and Coffey fell under an ecclesiastical ban because he considered his first duty due the government whose sworn officer he is, while the priest insisted that the church came first of all. Fortunately, Coffey is very patriotic, and made his instructions his guide and law. While matters were in this state, no charges having been made against the Coffeys, they received a letter from Archbishop Gross, that, without a word of accusation or fault-finding, peremptorily excommunicated Agent Coffey and his daughter, and forbade them any more partaking of the communion of the Catholic church. Hearing of this state of affairs and fearful that efforts will be made to prevent the confirmation of Agent Coffey when the Senate meets, citizens of Pendleton hav generally signed a memorial asking our senators to do all they can for him, and giving him their hearty indorsement. This was brought to this city by Mr. Page-Tustin, of Pendleton, who presented the matter to the Oregon senators.

With the indorsement of three United States Indian inspectors and the good will of citizens of both political parties and all religious denominations, Mr. Coffeywill be apt to remain in charge.

The Ravings of Defeat.

From the Catholic Record, London, Ont.

The radical government of France, not content with having banished the religious orders, secularized institutions, suppressed the catechism, proscribed the priest and the crucifix from the school, has now resolved to drive forth from the schools the religious, male and female, who hav consecrated their lives to education. Under the heading "Law of Maledictiion," Le Gaulois says that thus was named in Belgium the law relating to education analogous to that quite recently under discussion in the French Chambers, and which is sure of ratification by the majority, for party lines hav been tightly drawn on the subject, and the majority is compact. Three hundred and sixty-three members approve the measure from beginning to end, and giv it their votes at every step of its progress. One hundred and eighty votes are solid against the bill. These two figures represent, on the one hand, all the republicans combined in assaults upon religion, and, on the other, the strength of the conservativ batallion defending the sacred soil of religious freedom inch by inch before the cruel invader. In Belgium the debates on the law of maledictiion, which secularized school and school-teachers, were more bitter and exciting than in France. In the former country the bill was passed by but one vote of a majority. And in order to escape the humiliation of proclaiming a result at once hateful to his soul as a Christian and a patriot, the president of the Belgian Senate, Prince de Ligne, handed in his resignation. Yet the Belgian was less odious than the French law. It did not forbid the teaching of catechism. The Belgian liberals did not dare go as far as their French radical brethren and proscribe God from the schools. The law under discussion in the French legislature is the last halting-place of the great republican movement against religious instruction. With an infernal skill the republic, while making war on God, assailed the very root of religion—the soul of youth. Destroying whatever of standing harvest it could, the republic now seeks to ruin the very germs of future harvests. The radicals commenced by Article Seven—the famous Article Seven of M. Ferry—which ordered the expulsion of the religious orders, then they laicized education, banished the catechism, the priest, and the crucifix from the school-room. Nothing now remains for them in their unhappy task but to drive by force from their posts the religious, male and female, devoted to the work of teaching youth. This is the work, the purpose, of the new law. It is now almost seven years since the work of infamy was begun—it is just now being brought to completion.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

THERE are about a thousand of our subscribers in arrears, their indebtedness aggregating some two or three thousand dollars. To each one of these debtors, of course, the amount is small, but to us the amount is very large, and sadly hinders our work. We need this money—need it now—and we respectfully ask that it be remitted.

It costs a great deal of money to publish a large journal, and we hav no extensiv advertising patronage to help us out. We depend entirely upon the subscription list and book sales to obtain cash to pay bills, and when so large a sum as two and three thousand dollars is kept from us, the financial shoe grows painfully tight.

Every subscriber can see upon his tab just to what date his subscription is paid. Those whose time has expired are requested to remit at once.

ENON VALLEY, PA., DEC. 15, 1886.

MY DEAR MR. MACDONALD: Enclosed I send you a money order for three dollars to pay for my next year's TRUTH SEEKER.

Allow me to say that I am surprised and ashamed at your "Special Notice" in the paper of the 11th inst., in which you tell the public, as well as all whom it immediately concerns, that there are a thousand of your subscribers who owe at your office nearly three thousand dollars. Only think of it! A thousand Radicals, who profess to hav rejected the false theology of the church, and the bad morals it engenders, but who read your paper for a whole year, and never pay for it! This fact, with similar ones gathered from the experience of the Boston Index and Investigator, hav cut the comb of my vanity effectually, for I hav boasted that our Radical brethren were governed in all the relations of life, and especially in their business relations, by the sentiment of honor and of justice, and did not need the church's devil at their heels to chase them into the path of duty. Once a week, and fifty-two times a year, when they open THE TRUTH SEEKER, hav these delinquent readers been silently rebuked for their neglect, their indifference, and their dishonesty, and still go unreformed! If all the rest of your subscribers would imitate their example, how long would THE TRUTH SEEKER flag wave?

But, Messrs. Editor and Publisher, you yourselvs are in a great measure to blame for this disgraceful and humiliating condition of things, by declining to adopt the policy of all the prosperous papers of the country, which requires of every subscriber that he pay in advance, and that, at the expiration of the time paid for, the paper will be stopped, unless renewed. Suppose the post-office department would adopt your unjust plan, and carry letters on promises to pay the postage some time when it is convenient, how long would we hav a postal system? If a railroad company would carry passengers on promises to pay in future for their tickets, how long would it be before it would go into the hands of a receiver? A publisher needs his money to run his paper during the coming year, and, in plain English, if a subscriber don't pay according to the contract he makes, he is guilty of a fraud.

I say above that your credit policy is unjust. It is unjust to yourselvs, for you hav no more right to defraud yourselvs than to defraud others. It is unjust to your paying subscribers, who are compelled to feel ashamed so frequently by the odious duns to delinquents. A man of sensibility, and who is just and honorable on principle, don't want to be associated with a set of delinquents who are so blind as not to see that they are committing a fraud in neglecting to pay their honest debts. Then, again, you are unjust to these very delinquents. You owe it to them, as brethren, to rebuke their abominable carelessness and dishonesty, lest they go on, under your tutorship, and become fraudulent in greater matters. It is only he that is faithful in little that is faithful also in much. The principle of honesty extends to dimes as well as to dollars; and it is cruel in you, gentlemen, to see an otherwise clever fellow contracting habits of dishonesty without rebuking him for it both by word and deed. You remember the fable of the young criminal who, before mounting the steps to the gallows, asked permission to kiss his weeping mother good-bye, and, instead of kissing her, bit off her ear, saying that if she had corrected his fault of pilfering when he was a child, it would not now be necessary for society to put him to death as a thief. I was going to say—yes, I will say it—that if publishers will continue this slip-shod policy of allowing themselvs to be defrauded out of their money, they deserve to lose it.

The only excuse you can offer for tolerating such dishonest conduct on the part of your non-paying subscribers is that, by adopting the pre-payment rule, and sticking to it inexorably, like the post-office department and the railroads, you may lose the patronage of the delinquents. "Patrons," do you call them? Why, the more you hav of such kind of patrons the nearer you are to bankruptcy and ruin! Patrons! Molly Kelly! My neighbors are nearly all in the milk business, and they tell me that it is the hardest job to collect the money of their customers after the milk is used. The credit system is a damnable one. It converts honest men into rogues by playing upon that feature in the character of human nature which makes a man hate to pay for a dead horse.

Now, Mr. Editor, I want you to publish this letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Don't put it in some obscure corner of the paper among the advertisments, and in small type, so that no one will see and read it. Give it a conspicuous place in your columns, for I think your paying subscribers, who alone are your patrons, and who are zealous for the reputation of their associates, hav a right to be exempted from the mortification of reading these frequent duns of delinquents. If these hundreds of people are poor and cannot pay for their paper, giv it to them for nothing, and set down the amount in your column of private charity. But if they are able to pay, and you are unable to spare the money, you must do as the railroad conductor does—require a ticket, or refuse a would-be passenger a seat in the cars. Business is business.

A. B. BRADFORD.

Mr. Bradford's indignation is very just, though he is a little indiscriminate in dealing it out. Certainly no honest person will take and read a paper for which he does not intend to pay. Although business rules would require us to exact payment in advance, we are willing to accommodate subscribers as far as we can afford to. There are three classes of delinquents: 1, those who neglect to pay through inability to do so; 2, those who neglect to pay through carelessness; and 3, those who, we are pained to conclude, neglect to pay through dishonesty. If we were able to separate and classify these, we should then know whom to trust and whom to mistrust. Payment strictly in advance would probably giv us fewer subscribers and more money, but as subscribers are what we are most desirous to obtain, we hav adopted the present system, and bear the loss of the money as philosophically as possible. Upon reading this, we expect that in order to escape suspicion of belonging to the third class enumerated above, every subscriber in arrears will make a vigorous effort to remit at once.

Here is another letter:

MR. EDITOR: Your announcement that between two and three thousand dollars was due for THE TRUTH SEEKER both surprised and grieved me.

Can it be possible that such a sum as that is due for such a paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER? Less than ten cents a week for a rich feast served to its readers promptly every week!

To me it is very cheap. If I had no other way to pay for it I would work nights, or do without something, but I would find a way to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

We can assure Brother Mitchell that we share his grief. But there is a bright side to the cloud. Here is a streak of silver breaking through a rift:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Dec. 17, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I see that my subscription is out Jan. 1, 1887. I send $10 to pay for that year. The paper is worth it. Expose the hypocrisy and Jesuitism of Catholicism. Hold up the Nine Demands conspicuously. I also send $10 for Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, toward his work.

Very truly, E. M. DAVIS.

Does God Own the Land?

Henry George declares that the fact that man did not create land debars him the right to own it. But if creation is to be the test of ownership, what is there in this world which man can claim the right to own? All wealth comes from the land. This is admitted. Whence, then, comes man's right to any property? It looks to us as though Henry George, in attributing the ownership of the land to the creator (God), is surrendering his birthright to a ghost. But isn't there something a trifle medieval in this claim that God owns the land? Is it not the foundation of the kingly prerogativ to rule by divine right? If God owns the land, and if the priests are his agents, are not the priests the divinely-appointed rulers of the land? How does Mr. George know that God created the land? How does he know there is a God? What evidence has he that the land was ever created at all? Did God create himself? If so, whence did he derive the power to do so? If not, does he own himself? If he does not own himself, who does own him? And who created and owns the creator that created and owns the creator that created and owns the land? and who created and owns the creator that created and owns the creator that created the creator that created—but where will this stop? Nowhere. Mr. George believes that no man should hold land that he does not use. Does God use the land? For what? To rip up with earthquakes and to devastate with cyclones. Can these be called "improvements?" Does Mr. George call his theory a solution? It raises more questions than we could ask in a week, and there is no answer to any of them. The question of creation must be left unsolved. It can hav no relation to the question whether men can rightfully own land or not. The land question must be settled with God left out.

Tightening the Chains.

It cannot be very gratifying to those interested in the abolition of priestly influence over the secular conduct of the people to review the progress of the Romish church during the year 1886. Up to a year or two ago instances of ecclesiastical meddling with public affairs had for some time been somewhat rare. It was thought that the temporal power of the Catholic church in America did not, after all, amount to enough to constitute it a subject of contemporaneous human interest. Later encroachments of this organization hav entirely exploded that idea.

The first move was made in Toronto, where, owing to the ignorance of the masses, the rule of the church amounts almost to a hierarchy. About the beginning of May, Archbishop Lynch of the Toronto province issued a mandement prohibiting any Catholic of his archbishopric from joining the association known as the Knights of Labor. A great deal of discussion ensued. It was claimed by some Catholics that the archbishop had exceeded his authority, that the order was not mandatory, and that it would be revoked by the pope. The fact remains, however, that the mandement has not been recalled, and the greater likelihood is that it will be duplicated in the United States.

As dangerous a feature of this aggression as could possibly exist is the attack of the church upon the established school system of the country; and that this aggression is of no small degree is shown by the number of parochial schools established during the past year. Statistics hav not been formulated to show the exact extent of this evil, but there is no doubt that these schools count up into the hundreds, if not thousands. Another year will probably find them in nine out of ten of all the Catholic parishes in the United States, and a demand that must be met one way or another, and that at once, will be made for a portioning out of public school money to support them. The moment this is granted, Roman Catholicism will become practically the officially-recognized state religion of the American Republic.

Ecclesiastical intermeddling in family matters has also advanced a step. The pope, in his latest encyclical letter, forbids Catholics, upon pain of incurring his displeasure, to marry with those not of their own sect.

Archbishop Elder, of Cincinnati, has just issued a circular letter denying to Roman Catholic vocalists the right to employ their talents in the synagogs of the Hebrews or in the Protestant churches.

Priest McGlynn, of New York, is to be suspended from the performance of his clerical functions, and must go to Rome, and apologize to the pope for exercising the freedom of speech upon political subjects.

A little while ago a man died in New York who was connected with a penal institution, the managers of which objected to having Catholic teaching thrust upon its inmates. The family of the dead man, Judge Alker, wished him to be buried from the cathedral on Fifth avenue. Their request for this was denied by Archbishop Corrigan, and it may now be understood that all who oppose the "Freedom of Worship bill" will be deprived of the full benefit of the clergy.

Elsewhere we copy from a Western paper an account of a conflict between church and state in Oregon. Mr. B. Coffey, Indian agent at Umatilla, Or., in the discharge of his official duties, came in collision with the will of a priest. He obeyed the state rather than the church, and was promptly excommunicated.

These are but a few of the many instances of priestly dictation scattered through the record of the past year. This dictation, of course, affects only Catholics; but Catholicism is a growing power, and the time is coming when it will hav a hold upon others. The test of membership in the church may become the test of eligibility to public office, and public office, instead of being a public trust, will become a religious privilege. The laws of the church will be the laws of the land under the church. Those are blind who cannot see this. The danger from this source overshadows all others which threaten the foundations of religious liberty. The radical remedy is, of course, the promulgation of Freethought ideas and the eradication of all forms of superstition while the liberty of speech and press are still vouchsafed to us. At the same time a zealous watch must be kept upon all legislation looking to the granting of special privileges not only to any special sect, but to any form of religion.

We Ask to Be Excused.

A circular has reached us from the Anti-monopoly League stating that a struggle for the United States senatorship is now going on in this state, and that in this contest the sympathies of the Anti-monopolists are with the present senator, the Hon. Warner Miller. The name of Mr. Miller's opponent is not given, but the circular says regarding him that "it is publicly boasted by an activ agent of the candidate that $250,000 will be spent in behalf of that candidate, a man who has had no training for the place, and who represents no interests except those of the bankers and brokers of Wall street. This bold attempt to secure the senatorship from the state of New York by the use of money, and to turn the state into a rotten borough, must be squarely met, and we ask the coöperation of every good citizen to assist in preserving the integrity and good name of a state in which we hav a patriotic pride, by using such influence as is in his power to return Senator Miller to the place he now fills with so much credit."

It is beyond dispute that a man to whom the above description accurately applies is not fit for a senator. Whoever he may be, we hope he will be defeated. A man who will spend a quarter of a million of dollars to secure an office worth five thousand must hav some ulterior object in view. His desire to serve his country is too intense to be genuin. We throw him overboard at once.

The reason is next given by the circular why we should support Mr. Miller. It is because:

"To us who hav been interested in the measures for the regulation of inter-state commerce; the prevention of the importation of contract labor; the protection of American industries; and to the farming interests that are injured by the traffic in oleomargarine, his course has been particularly acceptable, and we respectfully urge that a man with such a record must not, for the credit of this state, be superseded by a mere representativ of money."

We are free to state that these recommendations do not arouse our enthusiasm. They are not sufficiently explicit. It is not apparent to us why there should be any measures regulating inter-state commerce. Inter-state commerce should be able to regulate itself by the general rules that govern all other commerce.

The importation of contract labor is a serious question. The fact that it is necessary to prevent it shows that there is something wrong somewhere else. It should be the work of statesmen to find out where that wrong resides which has forced America to the humiliating necessity of excluding any honest man from its shores, whether he comes under contract or not, so long as the contract is voluntary.

The further fact that American industries must be protected is equally deplorable. It is a confession of industrial weakness. The object of protection, as its advocates allege, is to exclude foreign manufactures. This givs American manufacturers a monopoly of American trade. Why should an Anti-monopoly League favor such a scheme as that? According to statistics, the manufacturing class number three-tenths of the population of the country; the non-manufacturing class number the other seven-tenths. Reckoning from a world-wide basis, this latter class pay for all home manufactures a per cent above the cost of producing them equal to the per cent of duties levied on foreign products. When anything is sold above the cost of production and distribution, the buyer is cheated. To take money from the pockets of seven men, and place it in the pockets of three other men, is not in the direction of discouraging monopoly, that is to say, the concentration of wealth in the hands of the few. Neither can this exchange of money add materially to the wealth of a nation as a whole. It is generally held that the resources of a country are developed through the soil rather than through manufactures. This is a great question.

Again, for some mysterious reason, Mr. Miller would protect the farmers from the incursions of the oleomargarine men, and thus secure to them a monopoly of the trade in the material, of whatever name, which we spread upon our bread; and the Anti-monopoly League asks all good citizens to giv him their aid. The consumer of oleomargarine is required to pay two cents per pound (we believe that is the rate) above the legitimate cost of the production and distribution of that commodity. This confers upon him the concomitant privilege of paying at the same increased rate for his butter. That is another great question.

Lastly, common report has it that Mr. Miller has a monopoly, through a patent, of the process of making paper from woodpulp. He is, in fact, none other than the Woodpulp Miller of contemporaneous politics. Through this monopoly, protected by patent and tariff, he is enabled to sell a cheap article at a high price. He stands toward legitimate paper men exactly in the attitude of the oleomargarine men toward the farmers. There is no question about this.

Before we can unreservedly support Mr. Miller, we want to ascertain his views on the question of taxing churches and enforcing the rest of the Nine Demands of Liberalism. We want to know whether he is in favor of a tariff on church furniture as well as on secular utensils; whether he is in favor of taxing the home of the priest as well as the home of the farmer and the artisan; whether he is in favor of church exemption or not. We hold that, while the government is supported by compulsory taxation, all property should bear its equal share of the burden. What are Mr. Miller's views on this subject? What does he think about the land question—the giving away of great tracts to railroad corporations? What is his attitude toward the silver problem—the contraction of the currency—the heaping up of great hoards in the treasury at Washington? Unless he takes radical grounds on these questions, we decline to advocate his reëlection. The United States Congress has done nothing, within the memory of the younger inhabitants, of sufficient importance to furnish an excuse for its existence. It needs new blood and new questions to stir it. We hav no assurance that Mr. Miller will furnish these, and therefore, as remarked, we ask to be excused from taking any part in his campaign.

Besides, THE TRUTH SEEKER is not a political paper, as the term is generally understood—and this is not intended for a political article.

The Lay Sermon.

We are now filling orders for Colonel Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon" as fast as sent in. The sermon makes a 25-page pamphlet, and is issued in a style above criticism—large type, heavy paper, good press-work, and ornamented cover. It is revised for publication by the author and is printed in this shape with his sanction. It is not only a wonderful sermon, but it sells wonderfully cheap—single copies, 5 cents; one dozen, 50 cents. Larger quantities at special discount.

OTHER NEW PUBLICATIONS.

"Little Lessons for Little Folks," by Aunt Elmina (Mrs. E. D. Slenker). This will please the little ones. It is in large print, with an illustrated cover, like that seen in the advertisment on another page, and there are pleasing little pictures at various places throughout the book. Forty cents.

"Economic Equities: a Compend of the Natural Laws of Industrial Production and Exchange," by J. K. Ingalls, author of "Social Wealth." A work of much ability. Twenty-five cents.

"Personal Existence after Death Improbable," by L. R. Smith. This is our first knowledge of Mr. Smith as an author, but the impression is good. Fifteen cents.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1887 is not yet ready for delivery, and we can at present do no more than prepare the public mind for its appearance. It will hav one feature which no other book ever possessed, to wit: it will contain all the religious laws now on the statute books of all the states and territories, including oath, blasphemy, and Sunday laws, together with statistics on church exemption, etc. This feature alone will make it invaluable to Liberals; but there are others, which will be mentioned later. As usual, twenty-five cents will be the price.

THE clergymen of Chicago deserve credit for their ingenuity in devising a new method of "working" the free pass method at the theater. Having resolved that we view with alarm the increasing danger from the ballet, and that their utterance might lack no distinguished die, they specified the American Opera Company as particularly inimical to virtue, and then awaited the issue. The manager of the American Opera Company fell into the trap, and offered the ministers a free chance to see for themselvs what the ballet was like. Of course, there was a rush, and on the evening of December 16th, says the report, seventeen bald ministerial heads shone luminously in the front seats. It is said that the ninety or one hundred girls composing the ballet arose to the necessities of the occasion, and kicked their heels a little higher than usual, and that several of the clerical gentlemen fled the scene. Those who remained announced themselvs as well pleased, and were sorry when the première danseuse had gyrated upon the point of one great toe and aimed the other at the gallery for the last time. Those who went away hav since expressed regret that they didn't stay to see the show through. As a result of all this the ministers hav the entrée to the theater, and the opera company has a big advertisment. Thus is the cause of morality subserved.

THE editor of the Progressiv Age says that the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has been obliged to cease his utterances about the Chicago Anarchists "because of loss of subscribers." The Progressiv Age may hav sources of information regarding this matter superior to our own, but thus far no one, to our knowledge, has discontinued this paper from the cause alleged. If such a thing should occur, it would only serve to show that the subscriber made a mistake in supposing that he wanted a Freethought paper. But it was not to dispute with the editor of the Progressiv Age that we hav noticed his little aberration. He has said that the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has ceased his utterances on a certain subject because of loss of subscribers. The statement is not true. There is no foundation for it whatever. We wish Brother Jamison would say without evasion why he printed such a statement as that. It is an interesting question in psychology. If the cause of lying could be reached, something might be done of a radical nature toward reducing the total volume of untruth. Dr. Monroe, of the Ironclad Age, should also study this question. It is one with which both of these gentlemen are more familiar, apparently, than with matters of law affecting new trials for convicted Anarchists.

IT is said that the Rev. Father McGlynn's participation in the George campaign is not his only offense. He has declined to establish a parochial school in his parish, has discouraged the practice, which poor Catholics hav, of giving all their loose change to the church, and the amount of money which he has raised from his congregation is not satisfactory to the higher authorities. Furthermore, he has taught his flock that the place to be happy is here and now, and that the prospect of a rich reward hereafter is no reason why anyone should be satisfied with a miserable life here. Father McGlynn has a great opportunity before him. If he keeps a stiff backbone, and will run for pope, he can rely on THE TRUTH SEEKER'S support against any other candidate yet heard from.

COURTLANDT PALMER, elected president of the Secular Union at the last Congress, has accepted the position, and will make his usual yearly contribution of $200. Mr. Palmer is now traveling in Europe in search of health and strength, in which search, all will be pleased to learn, he reports fair success. Long liv President Palmer!

MR. A. T. MCMILLAN, of Wamego, Kan., is doing good work in a series of articles on religion published by the Kansas Agriculturist. It would be a good plan, wherever practicable, for Freethinkers to act as correspondents of their local papers. Most communities would take kindly to occasional mild doses of common sense.

THE Avant-Courier notes this gratifying state of affairs; "Archbishop Corrigan damns Socialism. Socialism damns archbishops. So honors are easy."

Honorable Mention.

The Truth Seeker Publishing Company, of New York, hav issued Col. Robert G. Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon," which appeared in the Gazetteer a few weeks ago, in neat pamphlet form, and will furnish single copies by mail for five cents each, or 50 cents a dozen. This is the colonel's authorized edition, he having carefully revised the proofs.—Sunday Gazetteer.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Nov. 24, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Let me record my vote in favor of the cartoons, and also let me say that the editor has my unqualified approval for the stand he has taken in the case of the condemned Anarchists of Chicago, for the meanest murderer gets a better show and a fairer trial than hav those men, for simply exercising their right of free expression; and when a government gets so good (or bad) that it will not bear criticism, without hanging the critics, then it is time it was overthrown. HENRY WALKER.

WEST VIEW, O., Dec. 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith find money-order for one dollar for Campaign Fund to help the good work along the coming year. It is my intention to subscribe one dollar each year for propaganda work, and should the good work lack funds, drop me a card and I will subscribe another dollar. I think if everyone that claims to be with us would subscribe one dollar yearly much more might be done.

The grand old TRUTH SEEKER reaches me every Saturday morning, and is more than welcome. I hope you will issue the cartoons in book form, with notes explaining them; it would be such a good book for children if the pictures were explained. Mr. Tanney and myself will take one each.

Wishing you success, I am, etc., A. E. SMITH.

KENT, OHIO, Dec. 4, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: A friend of mind handed me THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 20th. According to your statement, "a number of English-Americans held a meeting . . . and proposed to erect, on the highest point of land about New York harbor, a colossal statue of the queen [Victoria] one hundred feet higher than Bartholdi's Liberty." This means, I suppose, that monarchism is "one hundred feet" preferable to a republican form of government. If such a monument is erected, I would like to be one to 'elp kick the kussed thing clear across the Hatlantic. I hav nothing against Queen Victoria. She would make as good a housewife as any other haristocrat, for anything I know to the contrary. If Wiman and those other fellows want to immortalize themselvs by such an act, why don't they ship themselvs to the other side of the "pond," and not offer such a base insult as that to the American flag? Tell them for me that there is at least one Hinglishman on this side of the water who thinks it is time a check was put upon the fawning and cringing at the feet of monarchs. JOHN DAVEY.

SO. BARRE, Dec. 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am no Anarchist, but am in sympathy with those Chicago men. They did not hav a fair trial. Public opinion, and not evidence, convicted them. I believe the bomb-thrower, if ever found, will come from Pinkerton's planning, or be some worthless, wanton fellow employed by capital. The case is too much like that of D. M. Bennett.

Now, my friend Eugene, all that you hav said in THE TRUTH SEEKER in behalf of those eight men in Chicago was well said, and in justice much more should hav been said—the name of your paper demanded it. I am surprised that so many claiming to be Liberal are so ready to condemn on such evidence as Gilmore's and such ruling as Judge Gary's. If Chicago hangs them, it will not be legal, but malicious murder. But they will not hang; they are not proven guilty under the Constitution.

May we not awaken one sober thought, one ray of reason? To go back to 1860—there was Anarchism. Whom did we hang? One woman. Shame! Why were Jeff Davis, Lee, and many others protected? Where is Davis to-day, and what is he teaching? Is he not making bombs for some future day? Let us try, at least, to be consistent. Consistency is said to be a jewel, and certainly we are not overstocked with gems in these times. M. B. DELANO.

KANSAS CITY, MO., Nov. 30, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I notice an article in your paper written by Lucy Colman, a part of which was good, and a part was not wholesome, good, or intelligent; nor does it tend to further Freethought and reform. She says through the kindness of Mr. Ryan she made the acquaintance of Lucy Parsons, a mulatto. Mrs. Parsons has been going around the country making ludicrous speeches, and calling the officers of the law thieves and murderers. Mrs. Colman thinks the condemned in Chicago, if hanged, will be martyrs, after all of their deeds of wilful murder, and their insult to the American flag, the flag that should be dear to every citizen of America, by waving a red rag or flag. She thinks Mrs. Parsons is a splendid woman for saying, Down with the government! There is no accounting for taste, however. Such things hav a tendency to retard Freethought and reform for years, and should not be tolerated by the honest American citizen, as no man should be permitted to hoist a flag of any description in this country and cry, "Down with the stars and stripes!"—the flag that protects them from the tyranny of foreign powers—which the condemned Anarchists are certainly guilty of doing.

Now I will just say that I am a Liberal, so far as it goes without violence, and no further, as the churches hav been guilty of enough of that already. And I take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hav taken it for six years, and expect to take it, but such articles are a detriment to its circulation. Every paper, after I hav read it, I giv to some one where there is a prospect of a subscriber, consequently I am getting up quite a lot of new subscribers here. I also sell the "Bible Abridged," Ingersoll's "Gems of Thought," and Paine's "Age of Reason," while I talk Infidelity to the God and Christ system. I hope for prosperity of the cause, but criminals, either from secret orders or the church, must be punished for their crimes, or there is no freedom for the average citizen of this country. A. B. FOX.

WILLIAMSON, N. Y., Dec. 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Through the efforts of Johnny Beach, the son of Ashley Beach, of Williamson, N. Y., Mr. Remsburg was induced to come and giv us a lecture—subject, "The Apostles of Liberty"—in Tassell's Hall, November 29th. The evening was dark and gloomy, rain falling fast; still, there was a fine audience, who took the lecture in in solid chunks. This lecture was conceded by all people of intelligence and education to be one of the finest ever delivered in this town. All, except three or four old shellbacks, were highly delighted, and went home with their spiritual strength renewed.

This boy Johnny, of seventeen, is good Beach timber, and warranted not to crack or check. He has been reared under the influence of the Baptist church. You will find no baptism or immersion on his plate. He never was a member of a church, but was reared under its influence. His parents were Baptists by birth and habits, but not in brains, and for many years hav followed the church. There are about forty of this Beach family, nearly all of whom are connected with some church. John is making havoc in their ranks, backed by his parents, and a few older men, who are bound to stand by him. I asked three of the ministers to read the notice of Mr. Remsburg's meeting, and not one of them would do so. Your readers all know why. A. G. AUSTIN, M.D.

CLEOPATRA, MO., Dec. 8, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $8.50, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year as directed. The people in this section of country are not willing, as yet, to risk anything that leads them away, or weakens their faith in tradition, composed as they are of seven er eight bankrupt insurance companies or sects. At times they make strenuous efforts to harmonize, especially if there is an Atheist in their midst. Some two months since one Rev. Pate came along and billed himself for four lectures at the Union church, notifying the people that if they would come out to hear him he would prove by the testimony of the apostles and prophets that God did not foreknow all things, and was not in possession of all power. Time came; they gave him a hearing that so bewildered them that some were actually mad, and told the speaker that he was meaner than old John Day, whereupon the old man said, Amen, come again soon. Then about a month ago an ex-reverend came along and told us to listen, and he would prove immortality and an angelic identity without referring to any written book. After hearing him the most of them said he made a failure, so at present writing I hav to report the people confused and in a state of mental delirium. When their attention is called to Freethought and investigation, that will giv them truth, and that in turn will giv them independence. Then they look suspiciously and say, Freethought, that means freelove, don't it? So they hav been fooled so often that this seems to be about the darkest time of all the past. The best that this club can do at present is to nominate R. G. Ingersoll for president of these United States in 1888. So we go along hopeful, having confidence in the evoluting forces and the Truth Seeker Co.

REFLECTIONS UPON COLONEL INGERSOLL'S "LAY SERMON."

CONCORD, KY., Dec. 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Upon first presentation, Gwendolen, George Eliot's masterpiece, strikes the reader as being a character very extraordinary—a type of womanhood so unique, so individual, so unlike anyone you had ever known before. But the writer, as if weary of the purely idealistic, fails to sustain the splendid anomaly, and finally allows it to merge into the mere mediocre. A similar bathos occurs in Romola. We infer that amid her logical sequences and "fine-spun" philosophies, these personal creations were regarded as merely side issues, not worthy of a continuance of the care that she at first bestowed upon them.

While I will not yield the palm of admiration for Colonel Ingersoll to anyone, yet in reading his "Lay Sermon" I thought I discerned a comparison between the gifted authoress and the gifted orator. His text, wrought of the brain of one of the gods of humanity, would at his hands, if anywhere, find ample justice. That is, he could see the vastness of the meaning; extract as much richness from it, or, in other words, interpret it as grandly, as the best. But in the course of his address, he touches upon certain points, that, like his distinguished compeer, he seems to look upon as merely side issues, leading us to conclude that human nature even in its best forms is subject to discrepancies.

The log cabin, with its corresponding floral adornments, its happy occupants, whose dreams are never haunted by mortgage or interest (which are no ghosts, by the way), is a pleasant picture to contemplate, and while few, perhaps, would exchange the castle for the cottage (the task looks easy), many would envy the humble dweller his exemption from harassing cares. 'Tis indeed a pretty poem, and I hav no wish to mar it. But it is a fact to be regretted that popularity clogs; that renown is often a dead weight, sometimes compelling the possessor to show himself only conservativly radical, radicalism to-day being in the main essential to renown. While in the above portrayal the speaker's sympathies evince, as they so often do, his love for the race, can he not see with his clear embracing vision that infelicia is written all over the national horizon? Then where is the appropriateness of so much national panegyric? Had our government remained true to its foundation principles, detraction might indeed hav been sacrilege, but when we compare the advantages this had, and still has, over other governments, it is straining a point to say it is the best. We can trace the outlines of a landscape better by being a little distance away than by being immediately upon it, and by parity of reason we do not perceive the wrongs committed at home so clearly as when committed abroad. But there are wrongs committed, and grievous ones, too.

The ballot is referred to as a means of redress, but so adroitly and unscrupulously manipulated as it is at present, it only plays into the hands of power. The instrument intended to secure liberty is by degrees taking its life. What are syndicates, conventions, and nominations as a relief to the suffering portion of society? These, and not the electiv franchise, constitute the ruling force, and those needing the remedy are as helpless as if immured in the dark dungeons of Goa. This may be treason, but it is truth no less; and when truth becomes treason, the end is not yet. The present state of affairs reveals a great variety of consciences, and it is presumed that he who thinks one way is just as sincere as he who thinks diversely, but at the same time it is better to search for the cause than condemn the effect. Those who attach such odium to certain names, and consider them a menace and danger to the government, should remember those names hav undergone modification of meaning just as mind has undergone modification of thought, and it is due to safety to discard hastily adopted conclusions, and permit cool reflection to don the ermin pro tempore. The Banquo of injustice is irrepressible, and retribution with glaring eye and bloodhound scent will avenge every wrong. There is a huge difficulty to be unraveled by this nation in the near future, the failing of which will place it in the condition of the weather-beaten old king, "the foolish old man, who still would manage those authorities he hath given away." VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

GREELEY, COL., Dec. 9, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Once more the dregs of orthodoxy hav been stirred by our friend and most profound logical reasoner, W. F. Jamieson. I think we are gaining a little foothold, as the audience was good each night, except the first, and it would hav been larger had it not been so very cold in the hall. The proprietor of the hall failed to hav an extra stove put up. People generally seem to think that an Infidel can stand anything, even to hear a lecturer speak in the dark, as the price of electric light went up so high that first night we failed to see it. The other nights we procured a better hall, and enjoyed the lectures: "What will You Giv Instead of Christianity?" "Thomas Paine," "The Rigid Rule of the Rich Makes Millions Mourn," "The Conflict Between Religion and Science," and "Has Jesus any Followers on the Earth at the Present Time?" The lectures were all very impressiv and instructiv. The Bible speaks of the inspired apostles. I think our Liberal apostle possessed far more inspiration in dealing with his subjects than the apostles of old. The crowning effort of his lectures was delivered the last night. The grandeur and beauty of his discourse at times held his audience spellbound, and at other times caused them to demonstrate their feelings with applause. He earnestly and zealously implored his orthodox opponents to meet him in open debate. In order to effect this result, he showed conclusivly that the Bible and common sense indorsed dispute. These principles as practiced by Jesus are absolutely rejected by his professed disciples. The strong army of Christians hav not the moral courage to cope with the Infidel adversary for fear of demolishing the shackles of religious superstition. The Israelites while under the Mosaic or theocratical rule marched with murderous and inhumanitarian principles, and stamped victory upon their banner. Yet the great army of Christians, who hav a trinity of power to direct them against the assaults of Infidelity, still hug the delusiv phantom of hope, and hurl the battle-ax of reason as far away as possible. Christians possess another element that we Infidels do not—faith. Why not be brave and courageous, as the champion and living exemplar has demonstrated? At least test the walls of Infidelity.

WORCESTER, MASS., Dec. 12, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Perhaps a few lines from the "Heart of the Commonwealth" may not giv offense to the friends who constitute so large an array of writers and subscribers to your valued paper. Until recently I hav not met a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER for months, but now an old and tried worker in the army of freedom, A. M. Driscoll, has it weekly for sale on his counter. Living so near the office of the Boston Investigator, we hav always rather leaned upon that for our staff and guide; but this is a growing county, and I find among your contributors many with whom I was associated in the short but eventful life of Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly. The Catholics, of whom we hav a goodly quantity here, hav established two or three parochial schools, in which the religious education of their young is to be carefully looked after, to the exclusion of all common sense, and, judging from what I hav seen of their pupils, one would vote the scheme a success. Emboldened by their success, not long since one of their clergy ventured to petition the city government for the repeal of the "water tax;" or, in other words, asked that the use of the city water be given gratuitously in some of the largest of their buildings. Think of it, you Liberals of America—millions of property in our fair land untaxed; 75,000 nondescripts, called by courtesy clergymen, to be supported by the toilers of this country because they are too lazy and shiftless to work, seeking by every means in their power to shut out the sunlight and shroud mankind in darkness and mental ignorance, and yet crying greedily for more power, more gold. Oh, that I might touch with words of fire the hearts of America's fathers and mothers and awaken them from their apathy! Oh, that I might open the eyes to the most damning of hideous slavery that ever cursed a human soul! Why, oh, why, cannot you look to Spain; why cannot you look to Italy, and see the results of giving power into the hands of the church? And only through our own grand free public school education can the sad experiences of these two countries be avoided. Then let us join hands firmly, Atheists, Freethinkers, Liberals, of all lands, nations, and peoples, against more concessions to that greatest, most hideous of all humbugs, "Religion," and her 75,000 "bums" and "beats." Yours for mental liberty,

FRED. L. HILDRETH.

LAKE CITY, IA., Dec. 9, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav worked on a farm over a half-century, and, having been a pretty close observer of all crops, I think I ought to be a competent witness in the chess case. I am just as positiv that wheat or timothy will seed, or either bring chess, as I am that two and two make four, and I will now giv my reasons. When a boy of twelve years of age a man rode up to our place, and commenced talking to my father. While doing so his horse was eating off the wheat that grew close to the fence and as far out as he could reach, and just that far out every wheat-stool brought forth cheat, or chess. But in many years of farming I found hard winters always producing chess more or less. I once put a new, clean piece of ground in wheat, and on the high ground, where I had taken out trees by the roots a foot over, it left steep depressions, and the snow lay in those holes all winter, while on high ground it all blew off. The result was, the high ground was nearly all chess; the low ground, as beautiful wheat as ever grew.

But, better still, in 1858 I was shown a stool of wheat, in Belmont county, Ohio, part wheat and part chess, the roots being inseparable. In 1843 or 1844, in many places in Ohio, the extreme dry weather changed the timothy meadows to chess; but all was right again the next year.

But more about timothy. I knew a man well in Washington county, Ohio, who sowed eight acres of timothy. It came up nicely; but what was his surprise the next season on going out to look at his timothy to find the entire crop cheat! He was much alarmed, thinking his farm would be taken with chess unless cut while green. But the best and premium farmer of the country told him not to be alarmed, to cut his cheat when it would make the best hay, and he would pay all damage if any harm resulted from his advice. He did so, and that was the last of the chess, and no man had a nicer timothy meadow after that than he. Now I will tell Mr. A. Moot something he does not know. He cannot raise a single grain of chess from pure chess and perfectly clean ground if it was to save his life. My uncle gave out a standing offer for thirty years, first at $5.00 per bushel for every bushel of chess so raised, but got none, and then made the offer double, but never got a bushel. When a mule will produce his or her kind, chess will do the same thing, but not before. There must be a mixture somewhere. Perhaps the strongest agricultural writer in the United States is Father Clarkson, of the Iowa State Register. He is a man whom Henry Clay was proud to know in his day; and he says the man that does not know that wheat will pass to chess is too big a fool for him to discuss with. Now, I would be far from saying that of Mr. Most. But, in all candor, it looks a little weak when a man calls for proof in a case wherein he has not presented one particle of evidence himself to the contrary. Respectfully yours, J. L. TOMPKINS.

BROOKTON, ME., Dec. 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Your excellent paper reaches me regularly each week, and seems to get more readable and interesting with each issue.

The illustrations I would not be without, as they show up in their true colors the hollow sham of Christian superstition and pretension. I thank you for the bold and determined stand you hav taken against the outrageous verdict in the case of the Chicago Anarchists—a verdict subversiv of every right guaranteed by the Constitution—and I am inclined to ascribe the granting of a new trial by the judge to your efforts and the efforts of those other papers which had the backbone to speak out.

But with all my praise and admiration for you and your paper, I noticed a poem copied from Life in a recent issue which was sadly out of place in a paper devoted to the reform and best interests of the human race. It was a burlesque and shameful caricature on the noble efforts of the Irish people to break the English yoke, at least in the management of their local affairs, and as selections giv character to a paper quite as much as original articles, I do not think that the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER can be held entirely blameless.

No one knows better than myself, or is more willing to admit, that the Irish are terribly priest-ridden; and while defending their political rights with a whole heart, I hav often drawn down their denunciations for expressing my opinions. But we should hav charity for the Irish, knowing the double load of oppression they hav had to carry, and after we hav shown a willingness to take—nay, hav taken—an activ part in helping them break the fetters of England, it will then be time to break the shackles of Rome.

I shall send, very shortly after our quarterly pay-day, for some of your pamphlets, some of which I will send with copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER to the benighted heathen in the province of New Brunswick, especially Fredericton, where Freethought missionaries are greatly needed. If you could send one of your lecturers over to open their eyes and crack the hard shell of bigotry, hypocrisy, and aristocracy with which they are enveloped, you would indeed be doing a good work.

Now, I hope you will pardon me for taking up so much of your valuable space and publish my letter entire and unchanged.

MARTIN BUTLER.

[Brother Butler's letter is above printed entire and unchanged as he requests. The verses which he criticises were put in the "Odds and Ends" for the fun there was in them. THE TRUTH SEEKER is in favor of giving Ireland a home parliament, even if the pope is made premier. The chief opposition to home rule springs from the religious prejudice of Protestants, and is of course wrong. At the same time, Ireland would be a rather tropical country for Protestants and heretics if home rule were once inaugurated.—ED. T. S.]

PRESCOTT, IA., Dec. 5, 286.

MR. EDITOR: You will no doubt remember my giving you a call at THE TRUTH SEEKER office on the 14th of last April on my way to England. And now that I hav returned, I would like to express my thoughts on a few things that I witnessed while there.

I find old England pretty much the same country in habits and customs as she was twenty years ago. She seems to advance very slowly. The lower classes, with some noble exceptions, seem to be still groveling in the dire depths of superstition and ignorance, accompanied by poverty and oppression, held down and robbed mentally and financially by the iron hand of the crafty priest and a rascally aristocracy. And, strange it seems, large numbers still bow their heads in tame submission, and become willing slaves to those twin monsters of superstition and oppression.

But while we are looking at the dark side of the government of England, we see a few bright spots in their political horizon that foretell a more glorious liberty than they hav heretofore enjoyed. The two brightest events in English history of to-day, it seems to me, are compulsory education and an almost universal suffrage. With those two mighty weapons of defense, the men of England in the near future will rise in their might at the ballot-box, and will annihilate the power and influence of those self-appointed law-makers, miscalled titled aristocracy, who hav oppressed the people of England these long weary years. And along with the downfall of this privileged class that pauper family of England, with its long train of treachery, crime, and oppression, will hav to meet its inevitable doom. On its ruins let there be built a glorious republic—a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

While in England I found there were many republicans—men who are tired of the extravagance and waste of money; men who hav read and studied their pitiful condition, and are to-day boldly demanding to know the reason why they hav to pay the enormous sum of £869,000, or nearly $4,350,000, to feed and keep in idleness a so-called royal family, a mere figurehead, that never was worth a cent to them except to act in collusion with a rascally titled aristocracy to rob and oppress them. Why is it that this same aristocracy of about 532 families, holding 13,888 offices, steal (legally) £108,614,632, or nearly $543,073,100, annually?—forty of those nice gentlemen holding offices to the number of fifty and upwards each; three of them holding over one hundred offices each; the highest number of offices held by one man being one hundred and twenty-seven. Eight of those titled gentlemen draw from the public treasury over $5,000,000 each annually. The highest amount paid to one man is £1,600,500, or nearly $8,002,500, annually. How does this showing look to the workingmen of England? How is this for old merrie England with her big boast of freedom and liberty? Yet the Tory gentlemen say it's the cheapest thing we've got. And let me say these are statistics written by Englishmen.

Another great question to be solved is put forward by the honest and thinking men of England. Where did this noble aristocracy obtain those vast possessions they now hold? Did they work for them? No (with few exceptions), history answers, Stolen from the people by dissolute and dishonest monarchs and bestowed on their favorit chums, and the offspring of their favorit courtesans. In looking at the present state of affairs, is it not time for honest men to call a halt to such proceedings, and say to those noble lords: Your ancestors stole the landed estates you hold from us; you hav made the laws ever since, and always largely in your own favor, and if you wish to continue to make our laws you must go subject to the votes of the people?

There is also another class of gentlemen that the people of England would do well to attend to. That is priestcraft, with its thirty bishops, a large majority of which sits in the House of Lords helping to make laws. It would seem at first sight that in those gentlemen the toiling masses would surely find a friend; but no, sir, they hav ever been the poor, cringing suppliants at the feet of wealth and royalty. Read their history and the above record is true; thirty or more of them drawing from the people the snug little sum of £148,040, or nearly $740,200, annually, beside an army of priests doing the work. Mr. F. Martin, on this subject, says in 1885 the total value of the ecclesiastical revenue must certainly be about £112,000,000, or nearly $560,000,000, beside an estimated sum of $5,000,000 voluntarily subscribed to the priests of Nonconformist congregations. A nice sum this—isn't it?—for superstition. Well may the thinking men of England stand aghast and demand in thunder tones what becomes of this enormous amount of money. Facts echo the answer, To keep in idleness, dissipation, and luxury a class of privileged drones called aristocracy, a pauper royal family, and an army of worthless, designing priests, pretending to get a living by promulgating and trying to perpetuate a superstitious theology that if they are the learned men they profess to be they know to be false. Truly, England needs many more men like Bradlaugh and Labouchere to fight the battles of political and religious liberty.

But while I hav been talking of superstitious England there remains some work for us to do here at home. We find rank superstition all around us. We hav had our Methodist and Baptist friends shouting themselvs hoarse for the last two weeks in a distracted meeting (that is what they call it—is it not?) to their Jew god to save somebody. And the result was, they took eight or nine victims to the river this winter morning, with the thermometer below zero, cut the ice, and plunged them under. Such scenes as those must be a powerful reminder to Liberals that they hav a great work to do yet before the human mind is free from the blighting effects of foolish superstition. But let us keep working on; the day will come when superstition, with all its baneful effects, will hav become a thing of the past, and victory will crown our noble efforts.

J. B. BLACKBURN.

KENT, OHIO, Dec. 13, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I do not wish to keep alive or agitate the question of justice or injustice regarding the seven Chicago Anarchists, and I am glad they are to hav a new trial, or, at least, hope this is the case; but I do wish your many readers who seem to be in sympathy with crime could know the actual facts regarding the works and doings of the Anarchists (or what other name you wish to apply to them) at Chicago. I happened to be in Chicago on business from February to July last, and my business took me past or near the Haymarket square nearly every day, and I think I know something of the facts in the case. I saw the class of people that made up the crowd at that time, and I wish to ask if the Anarchists did not actually parade the streets with a red flag at their head? Were not those seven men leaders and advocates of sentiments that were materially detrimental to a republican or any other form of government? Did they not advocate and advise the taking of the law into their own hands, and doing as they wished?

Did they not make inflammatory speeches openly, and advise the using of force to carry out their wishes? Were not bombs, or material for making the same, together with fire-arms, found with or in possession of nearly all of those seven men? If so, were they not as guilty as the wretch who actually threw the shell? If I advise and encourage you to kill a man, should you be punished and I go scot-free? I think just as much of the miserable devil who has the courage to murder as I do of a coward who sits back and advocates it. I feel sorry for those condemned men, who should hav known better than to teach such principles—sorry for their wives and children—but should I not hav as much feeling for the officers, who were protecting our lives and property, and were killed in cold blood? Hav they not wives and children, who are equally as sensitiv to feeling as those seven men, whom the law terms felons?

It is not necessary because we hav what we are pleased to call a "free country" that we allow the freedom of either speech or press to be carried so far as to endanger the lives of our people. We hav laws that are made by men selected from the people and by the people for the better protection of our freedom and form of government, and no man or class of men hav any national, natural, moral, or physical right to disobey any letter or part of those laws. If the majority of the people wish to change them, they can elect men for that purpose. The vote of the poor counts as much as that of the rich man. I belong to the former class myself, but I do not condemn the few who hav succeeded by strict attention to business, using economy, good judgment, etc., or who hav got money by what is termed "good luck." We all must "paddle our own canoe," and cannot use the water in which rests the canoe of another.

There is now being considered by the National Labor League the placing of a national boycott upon a well-known manufacturer in an adjoining town, which is expected to hav a bad effect on his business and to cause him to "come to time" and pay higher wages or close business. This manufacturer now employs several hundred men, who are keeping their families in a respectable way (or can), and hundreds of others stand ready to take the place of those workmen as fast as any one or all quit work. Now, suppose the shop should close, the manufacturers are perfectly able to retire from business. What would be the consequence? Why, those now at work would be thrown out of employment, and those now idle be no better off. But the League will say some other men with capital would take their places; but not unless they can be assured there is money in it and no strikes or boycotts to be ordered. When money is cheap, or at a low rate of interest, it is sure to seek investment, and if there is money in manufacturing, capital soon finds it out.

I believe strikes are a detriment to the laboring class, as a general rule, and while I like good wages as well as anyone, I do not ask or expect capital to keep me or my family in all the luxuries of the land unless I work for it. I hav no sympathy with men who strike for eight hours a day, spend eight hours more in a saloon, while their wives are putting in sixteen hours per day in poverty at home, taking care of a large family of children. This is my view on the question, from my own observation in Chicago and other places. The poor man generally is the one who has the most children, drinks the most beer, has more leisure hours, and is the first to be led away by bad advice. Let us support less superstition, better schools, make better laws, and liv up to those we hav better, and we will be better prepared to teach our children and liv ourselvs; hav more money, more, better, and happier homes; wear better clothes, drink less alcohol, and need less penitentiaries.

I cannot close without asking everyone to send to Converse Close, Grattan, Mich., for a little pamphlet on religion in general (hav forgotten the title of the book). I know not the price nor whether he keeps them for sale; a postal card will giv you the information. I hav never read a work by any author who used better language than Mr. Close—very conservativ, offending none, and respectful to all. Also Dr. Geo. W. Brown, of Rockford, Ill.; a little work entitled "The Sunday Question," fifteen cents. Both are good missionary tracts, and should be printed for sale for cheap distribution.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Our "General."

I've a very distinguished caller,
Or at least, so his title implies;
He's a general, and you would know it,
He looks so provokingly wise.
You should hear of his wondrous adventures—
He has had many narrow escapes—
But his presence of mind and his courage
Not a moment his heart forsakes.

He was shot once, but, just like a martyr,
He suffered with patience his pain,
And bore like a hero his trouble,
And never seemed once to complain.
I confess he's just a bit "cheeky"
When receiving or making a call,
But he's dignified, gentle, and loving,
And appreciates kindness from all.

Though valiant and strong, he is quiet,
Inclined to be lazy, I fear;
But trusts in your friendship so fully
He'll call on you year after year.
No lying, or swearing, or cheating,
He's guilty of nothing like that;
He'd scorn to get tight, like some gen'rals,
But then—he is only a cat.

But if he livs catly, not manly,
And does just the best that he can,
Why, isn't he doing his duty
As truly as many a man?
Don't you think, if he's faithful and useful
Abroad, or at home on the mat,
We can take his example with profit,
Although—he is only a cat?

The World We Liv In.

Many religious persons write volumes on the world beyond the grave, or the "heavenly home;" but the one that most concerns us at present is the world we liv in now, with its lovely flowers and flowing streams, its singing birds, its lofty hills, and smiling valleys. They all remind us that the resources of the world we liv in are vast in regard to ideal beauty as it is in stupendous grandeur. The world we liv in forms one of the planets which revolve around the sun as a center by unerring laws, known as centrifugal force and specific gravity. So exact are these laws that astronomers hav calculated the length of a year to the tenth of a second, though of course we little children know very little about astronomy, except what is told us, and what we read in geography. But it appears from what we know about it that there is no necessity for an almighty God to superintend this world, which is superintended by an unerring law of matter. Consequently I think it remains for us to study the world we liv in and not the future. This world with its beauty and grandeur of nature contains enough to occupy a lifetime. To cherish the laws which regulate the sociality of our personal being, and not a legendary faith of something beyond the grave, is sufficient for the world we liv in.

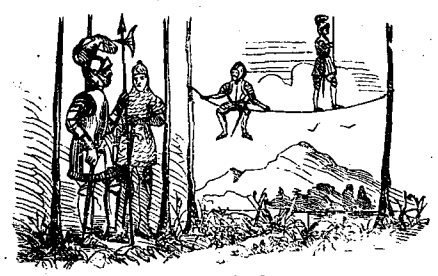
Our Puzzle Box.

1.—REBUS.

What musical instrument is here represented?

2.—A CITY.

A city famous far and wide,
A city fair to see,
And in it very long ago.
What may this city be?



—— was its name,
For fame known far and wide,
Until invaded by Christian priests—
Then men and women died.

Here great libraries stood,
And schools of science and art;
Here Hypatia lost her life
By priests with inhuman hearts.

But now no dark deeds are done
As in days of yore.
This beautiful city has fallen
To rise no more.

Correspondence.

WHEATLAND, OR., Dec. 1, 1886.

MISS SUSAN WIXON, Dear Friend: As I saw my other letter in print I, thought I would write again. I am going to school. It commenced the first Monday in October, and will be out in two weeks. Mamma has gone to Kansas on a visit to her relativs; she has been gone seven weeks. I would like to see her back again. We expect her in two or three weeks. We hav a pet deer. My brother caught it on Cape Lookout, so we named it Lookout. It was very little when he got it, but is now one and one-half years old. She will stand up and get her nose over a limb, and then bring it down and eat the leaves off; it is cunning to see her. The children will not dare to come in the yard when she is loose. We hav a genuin bird dog; it is a pup yet, but she has lots of sense. Pa took her out hunting, and, as young as she is, she will scent the birds. Her name is Trixie. Well, I will close. Yours with love,

MAUD WILLIAMSON.

NORWICH, CONN., Dec. 7, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: In a late TRUTH SEEKER you published a letter from Miss Katie Kehm which suggested to me that a good lesson for young people might be derived from a short account of a few facts concerning the writer of that letter herself. I know Miss Katie very well. She was a member of the Children's Lyceum, organized and conducted by me during an engagement with the Ottumwa Liberal Society some two or three years ago. She is a girl of good intellect, strong will, and indomitable courage and perseverance. Her education was acquired against difficulties and discouragements that few children hav to encounter. Being an ardent Freethinker and always outspoken in support of her own views, she naturally aroused the prejudices of her teachers and the large majority of her schoolmates, who were horrified at her blunt speech and Infidel ideas. Although of a very sensitiv nature, and fully conscious of the general dislike consequent upon her independent views, yet the brave girl toiled on toward the goal of her desires, leaving behind in the race most of her competitors and graduating with honor and merit.

During her school years many were the sharp skirmishes she had with both teachers and school-fellows; but her ready speech and sound logic soon became recognized, and her opponents were only too willing to hoist the white flag in token of truce. On one occasion, when called upon to prepare an essay to be read before the school, Katie horrified her teacher by choosing as her subject "Thomas Paine" Vain were all the objections; the resolute girl declared she would giv that or none. The most she would consent to was the modification of a few sentences in which she bore rather heavily upon the Author-hero's defamers. She carried her point, read her essay, and for the first time in their lives the large majority of the pupils listened to the truth regarding the merits and deeds of that heroic man. All honor to the brave girl who dared to defend the right regardless of opposition.

Katie afterward repeated her essay before the Lyceum, and for a girl of sixteen it was a fine production, well worthy its noble subject.

Since graduating, Miss Kehm has delivered a Liberal lecture at the Opera House in Ottumwa to a large audience. I did not hear it, but am told it was an excellent one. I am sorry to learn from her letter that she is debarred from teaching because of her Liberal views. Perhaps it is just as well. She is capable of teaching in a wider field than the four walls of a primary school. Let Liberals giv her a call, pay her expenses and a moderate compensation, and I hav no doubt she will be glad to deliver her lecture anywhere in the vicinity of her home. Surely her courage and devotion deserve recognition. Who will be the first to offer it?

Let me add, Miss Katie has no knowledge of any intention of mine to write this, but I feel that it is due her to be known and honored in this public manner. W. F. PECK.

[We cheerfully giv place to the above letter, and would call particular attention to it. It indorses our previously formed opinion that Katie Kehm is one of our bright and wide-awake young ladies of whom the Liberal world may be proud. She has exhibited a rare independence and devotion to principle, preferring to lose place and position rather than yield her views of right and justice. Since she evinces marked talent as a teacher and reformer, we heartily second the suggestion of Brother Peck, and trust she may soon be called to a wider field and a larger platform than that of a country schoolhouse.—ED. C. C.]

WHEATLAND, OR., Sunday, Nov. 28, 1886.

MISS S. H. WIXON: This is the first letter I have written to the Corner. As there hav not been many letters in for the last two or three weeks, I thought you might like to hear from Oregon.

Wheatland is not a very large town. It can boast of about one hundred inhabitants. It is tolerably lively when the farmers are hauling their grain to the warehouse. There were about one hundred and twenty-five thousand bushels of wheat stored here this fall. The boats are running, and it will be shipped down the river to different places. We hav had such a dry summer that the river has been too low for the boats to come up, but the Snag boat has been up, and cleared the channel, and since the rain they hav come up.

We take a good many papers, including THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like it about the best of all. The first thing I do when it comes is to look at the pictures (I think they are splendid), and then I read the Corner. It snowed here last Sunday, but the snow melted as soon as it touched the ground. It had rained the night before, and the ground was damp.

Wishing you success with the Corner, I remain, Yours, with respect,

A. MAY WILLIAMSON.

CHAMPLIN, MINN., Nov. 28, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Having become quite interested in the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I thought I would like to giv you a little history of myself. I am a little Catholic girl, thirteen years old. I hav been going to the sisters' school one year and a half. I stopped going to school last spring on account of having a little trouble. One of my schoolmates, a girl about the same age as myself, had a piece of wrapping-paper which she kept bothering me with all the forenoon. Finally I pinned it to her skirts; soon she went to ask the sister a word in her spelling, the paper trailing after her. Investigation found me guilty. The priest was sent for, and when he came he told me I could either take a whipping or leave school. I took my hat and left. I hav never been back since, even to get my books. I was confirmed by the bishop not long ago. I had never read a Bible until about a month ago. I was surprised to find it contained such trash and nonsense. I am living with a lady who takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. She and her family like it very much. This is my first letter. Hoping you will correct all mistakes,

I remain yours, MINNIE DAILEY.

[Minnie is evidently too bright a girl to hav her mind clouded by superstition. We hope to hear from her again.—ED. C. C.]

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—John Peck.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Anthor Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Book Review.

LIBERTY, as delivered by the Goddess at her unveiling in the harbor of New York, December 28, 1886. Brooklyn, N. Y. Published by the author at 1,248 Bedford Ave. 1886.

One of the most remarkable poems of our time has just been published by its author, Rev. Miller Hageman, better known as the "Bird Poet," some of whose minor poems hav appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER. This poem was written for the dedication of the statue of Liberty. It was accepted by the committee of arrangements as the poem of the day, but, owing to the drenching rain which spoiled the day's festivities, it was found necessary to abbreviate the program, and this poem, with other exercises, was omitted. No evil is ever entirely unmixed with good, and the necessary suppressing of the poem, which was considered an evil at the time, has proved a blessing, in so far as it has led to its publication in book form. The peculiar merit of this poem appears in the author's terse, crisp way of saying things that the world is eager to listen to; and when these sayings become better known, they cannot fail to be used frequently as apt quotations. That great master of rhetoric, Colonel Ingersoll, could not hav conceived more radical ideas, nor clothed them in language more startling, yet chaste and poetic, than has Mr. Hageman. The most extraordinary part of the matter is that Mr. Hageman, while giving utterance to the noblest thoughts in the most sublime language, cannot relinquish the idea that he is an orthodox clergyman.

There is inspiration in the opening couplet. It prepares and appetizes the reader for the feast that is to follow:

The dawn is on the mountain-tops, the night is flying fast,
The light the world hath waited for so long has come at last.

Liberty, released from the dark caves of ignorance and superstition, where she had long lain imprisoned, emerges holding with tireless hand a torch lighted in the land of Lafayette, and illumins the banner of freedom.

Red flamed its stripes of morning light, bright streaked its silver bars,
And, breaking through the azure blue, shone out the morning stars.

. . . . . .

Till, scoffing at the night that came to mock thee in the dark,
Thy heart with one electric throb shot out yon quivering spark,
The currents of whose truth shall thrill till all the sons of earth hall feel what liberty hath cost and what its light is worth.

The poet then asks:

Whence sprang the light that lit thy torch?

To which the goddess answers:

Shut up within the darkened soul, there yearned since time began
The light of that immortal truth—the liberty of man.
Through the long, tortuous labyrinth of ignorance and doubt,
The slow procession of the past is winding dimly out.
Borne not with outward signs of pomp the warder heard or saw,
That light came forth the latent power of universal law.

. . . . . .

In every country of the earth since years were in their youth,
The greatest friend of liberty hath been the light of truth.
In every nation of the past whose glory hath deceased,
The greatest foe to liberty, the craft of king and priest.

The goddess then points to the birth of freedom in this country:

Freedom for every man to come and every man to go;
Freedom for every man to reap whatever he can sow.
Freedom from party prejudice, from threat of craft or guild;
Freedom for every man to vote, for every man to build;
For every man to own himself, to act his manhood out;
Free to believe or disbelieve and doubly free to doubt.
Freedom from aping forms of cant, that snivels, drawls, and brags,
From fashions that adorn the dust, but leave the soul in rags.
Freedom from all alliances between the church and state,
That whelm the body politic with sacerdotal weight.
Freedom from old paternal power, drivel of dotard lands,
Freedom—for power is only safe n all the people's hands.
Freedom for scholar and for school, for pulpit, press, and speech,
For creeds that once hav ceased to learn hav also ceased to teach.
Freedom from ignorance, whose God is superstition's ghost,
From dogmas that hav made the cross a martyr's pillory-post.
Freedom for man to think before tradition's musty shelf,
Once for the text, twice for the gloss, and three times for himself.
Freedom in all its shining forms, for science, and for art;
Freedom for all the industries that multiply the mart.
Freedom from those restrictiv laws whose revenues hav ceased—
Freedom—for the best government is that which governs least.

The goddess points out the dangers that threaten freedom, and denounces her enemies:

Cursed be the law that grants away horizoned leagues of land,
That reads God's title to the globe, grasped by a dead man's hand;
That leaves a scion of the soil in poverty to go
Without a home above the ground, without a grave below.
Honor the proletariat, but spurn the guilty wretch
Who corners nature's gifts for what the pinch of want will fetch.
Cursed be the law, aye, doubly cursed, that dungeons men for debt;
That huddles vice behind its bars, and frees it viler yet;
That heaps a treasury for spoils, that seats without rebuke
On thrones of corporativ power a coronetted duke.

. . . . . .

Before the law was written down with parchment or with pen,
Before the law made citizens, the moral law made men.
Law stands for human rights, but when it fails those rights to giv,
Then let law die, my brothers, but let human beings liv.

The goddess pictures Great Heaven's Olympus repeopled with new gods, and describes the gods and their characteristics, thus:

What gods?—the Lord's anointed, clothed with a divine decree?
No!—for at every step they blocked the way to liberty.
What gods?—the scholars in their stalls, dishonestly devout?
No—for they scoured the candlestick, but put the candle out.
Whence come thy gods, O Liberty, from cloisters, senates, thrones?
Answer, ye racks, ye wheels, ye stakes, ye chains, ye dungeoned groans.
Who are these gods? popes, judges, kings, enshrined with storied bust?
Answer, ye waters and ye winds that waft the martyrs' dust.

Then a chorus of martyr voices join in the charge to Liberty:

Watch with eternal vigilance; let no man take thy crown.
Upon thy deep, colossal calm the centuries look down.
Watch—such a charge as thou dost keep, by all thy sons on high,
Brooks not one tremor of the hand, one closing of the eye.
By that immortal robe of thine thy form so warmly wears,
Welded together with our blood and woven from our prayers.
By every thread, by every fold, by every filament,
By every fiber of thy frame through which our life is sent,
By all who suffered for thy sake, by all who died for thee,
Hold up that hand for Liberty till all the world is free.
And when at length thy lonely task of prophecy is done,
Come up, thou daughter of the dawn, and stand within the sun.

The poet then drifts into transcendentalism, and in the presence of all the attending worlds the light of liberty is flashed upon the universe, and the effort concludes, leaving everything in a blaze of glory. When we inform the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that Mr. Hageman is a graduate of Princeton, and still looks with great fondness upon his alma mater, they will readily imagin the irate McCosh anxiously looking about for a birch switch with which to spank this naughty poet, who has given such a vicious and vigorous kick at the battered and bottomless kettle of orthodoxy.

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE. By Colonel Kelso. For sale at this office.

Colonel Kelso's latest work, "Spiritualism Sustained by the Bible," appears to be entirely unanswerable and unobjectionable. These terms may convey the idea of a nonenity in volumes, but applied to the production of that master-logician, John R. Kelso, they describe a discourse that is well rounded and perfectly finished. There is absolutely no roughness by which the opposition can obtain a hold. This work says to the Christian: "Accept the testimony of your own witness." You cannot fly from this point. To Freethinkers of all denominations I would say this is the best compendium of Liberal arguments I hav ever seen. Do not be prejudiced by the name; Spiritualism asks nothing more than a trial by common sense. No one can be blind to the fact that the church continually threatens freedom of speech, though church-members do not generally appreciate that they must themselvs share the fruits of their own intolerance. A work that invites all the warring parties to a parley is worthy of attention, and it seems that nothing can be more temperate and agreeable than the manner in which the author of "Spiritualism Sustained by the Bible" invites the critics to "come and reason together."

MRS. EVA V. COLLINS.

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED.

In his new work, "Spiritualism Sustained," Mr. Kelso has, as is his wont, gone to bed-rock, and proved his case conclusivly, so far as "The Bible," "The Christian Church," and "Necessity in God's General Government" are concerned.

I do not see how any believer in these dogmas can reject Spiritualism as a real truth, after reading these three chapters of the book, but when he comes to giving real proofs of the ghostly communings of shadows with substance, there he seems to me to hav lost his usually strong judgment and acute reasoning powers, and to hav become a "blind leader of the blind." In all this part of the book we are asked to take dreams, visions, clap-trap, and thaumaturgy for realities. He wisely says the tests which converted him would be no tests to others, but yet he asks us to believe in test-mediums!

This is too much like saying miracles will not convince, but you must believe in miracle-workers.

Now, I, for one, hav consulted the very best mediums, and hav seen almost every phase of the phenomena, and hav written to dozens of psychometrists, clairvoyants, etc., etc. I hav done these things in all earnestness of heart, and with a real desire to find actual phenomena, but I've never found a single test of any kind; yet a man of Kelso's wide experience in creed, dogma, and myth says: "These [tests] you can obtain from any good medium." I hope he will giv me the name of just one good medium, so I can try again. All who hav read Kelso's other excellent works will be anxious to read this one. Believers will want it, because they are eager for all help they can get to sustain their flimsy cause; unbelievers will want it, wondering what a man of Kelso's acuteness and reasoning powers can say in favor of this most wonderful and widespread delusion of the day.

VOLTAIRE'S ROMANCES.

I hav just read these romances of Voltaire, and must say they are truly wonderful.

Combining all the charms of romance with the philosophy of the sage—all the marvels of a Munchausen, or a Gulliver, with the common sense of a sound thinker—he produces stories that charm, interest, and enlighten.

There is a world of sarcasm and ridicule of pious absurdities, and a keen satire and wit, of which none save Voltaire hav ever been capable. Every novel-reader who wants fun, wit and wisdom, philosophy, piquancy, and simplicity done up in rich and sparkling sentences should secure these romances.

Voltaire was probably the wisest man the world has ever produced—the most far-seeing.

The book is beautifully gotten up, and is edited and annotated by Peter Eckler, which fact of itself should make it eagerly sought after and carefully read.

I bought my copy intending to sell it when read, but find it far too valuable to part with.

When I find a good thing, I always want others to share the treasure.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

A STUDY OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY

BY LEWIS G. JANES.

This book treats of the natural evolution of the Christian religion, its historical antecedents in Palestinian Judaism and Roman Paganism; investigates the history of the founder of Christianity in the light of the latest scientific criticism of the New Testament; shows that the true story of the Man Jesus, and his genuin teachings are separable from the later legendary accretions which hav confounded him with the mythical Christ, and traces the natural development of Christian dogma and ecclesiastical institutions. Complete references and full index. 320pp. 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price $1.50.

RELIGION is the perception of the relation in which we stand to the principle of the universe. But, if the principle of the universe be not an organic being, the model and prototype of man, the relation between it and human beings is absolutely none. Without some insight into its will respecting our actions, religion is nugatory and vain. But will is only a mode of animal mind; moral qualities also are such as only a human being can possess, to attribute them to the principle of the universe is to annex to it properties incompatible with any possible definition of its nature. It is probable that the word "God" was originally only an expression denoting the unknown cause of the known events which man perceived in the universe. By the vulgar mistake of a metaphor for a real being, of a potency for a thing, it became a man, endowed with human qualities and governing the universe as an earthly monarch governs his kingdom. Their addresses to this imaginary being, indeed, are much in the same style as those of subjects to a king. They acknowledge his benevolence, deprecate his anger, and supplicate his favor.—Shelley's Notes to Queen Mab.

The trial is secret. The cause of this wicked conduct on the part of the deacon is said to be the pastor's recent attack on the sellers of apple-jack, of whom the deacon is one.

G.: How do you manage with 'em?

B.: Well, I make home happy for them, never whip them—that destroys self-respect—make companions of them. Talk to them kindly when they do wrong, and show them it is manly to be good. If they injure any person, I make them go and apologize, and if there are any damages I make them good, and point out to the boys the injury they hav done to me in bringing upon me that expense. THE sixth age shifts
Into the lean and slipp'ered pantaloon,
With spectacles on nose and pouch on side;
His youthful hose, well saved, a world too wide
For his shrunk shank; and his big manly voice,
Turning again toward childish treble, pipes
And whistles in his sound. Last scene of all,
That ends this strange eventful history,
Is second childishness and mere oblivion;
Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything.
—Shakspere.

WHEN Christian theology encountered the problem of evil, it became necessary to relieve the almighty of all responsibility for it. That is a fine stroke in the story where Adam indirectly charges the Lord God with all the trouble: "The woman whom thou gavest me—she gave me of the tree, and I did eat." But the woman says, "The serpent beguiled me." Dear Eve, how hav the theologians thanked thee for that word! Identifying the serpent with the devil, they hav made him responsible for the existence of evil. But could she not hav said to the Lord God, "The serpent whom thou gavest me tempted, and I did eat?" If there is a devil, he is God's devil Either this or God is not infinit. If he is infinit, then there is nothing in the world which is not a fraction of his wholeness.—Chadwick's Rise of Man.

AMONG the sufferers at the auto-da-fe which Philip II. celebrated for his escape from shipwreck and his marriage with Isabella of France, was Carlos de Sessa, a young noble of distinguished character and abilities, who said to the king as he passed by the throne to the stake, "How can you thus look on and permit me to be burnt?" Philip then made the memorable reply, carefully recorded and panegyrized by his biographer, "I would carry the wood to burn my own son withal, were he as wicked as you."—Motley's Dutch Republic.

IN the first part of the present century, evolution began to unfold the flower of the mind under the form of science. Science has done what skepticism failed to accomplish—it has given knowledge as a substitute for faith. It has cultivated intense intellectual habits in modern society, and given mankind a sure test of truth and its method of verification by means of experiment, observation, and deduction. Science is inextricably hostil to supernaturalism. It knows nothing of a supernature; to it, all is nature, and nature is all. From prehistoric times the race has been under control of ignorance and fear, but science has given knowledge, and knowledge has given courage.—Bell's Irrepressible Conflict.

JESUS CHRIST was a man, with all the faults and imperfections of the prophetic character. The Bible is simply a collection of Jewish writings. The miracles in the Old Testament deserve no more attention than the miracles in Homer. The miracles in the gospels are like the miracles in Plutarch's Lives; they do not lessen the value of the biography, and the value of the biography does not lessen the absurdity of the miracles.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

BETTER not be at all than not be noble.—Tennyson.

MAN believes that to be a lie which contradicts the testimony of his own ignorance.—Anon.
